Now, I do not want to be unfair. If I am wrong I want to be set right. I do not want you to get a wrong impression, but I feel so deeply that we are up against a great problem. The most of our people with the present high cost of necessities can not bear any further burden, and therefore we should place it where men are able to bear it with the least sacrifice.

Mr. HILL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LUNN. I will.

Mr. HILL. I understood the gentleman to say that if he was wrong he wanted to be set right, and I want to set him right. England makes an exemption of something over $600 only. It makes one exemption. It does not make an exemption for the wife. We make an exemption of $1,000 for a single man and of $2,000 for a married man. England an exemption of about $600, and I understand $200 for each child. Which is the best?

Mr. LUNN. One hundred and twenty-five dollars for each child.

Mr. HILL. It depends upon the number in each family, and our exemptions are a great deal better than England's, and our income taxes are a great deal higher.

Mr. LUNN. Your exemptions for children are not——

Mr. HILL. We do not exempt for children. We exempt for a family where there is a family.

Mr. LUNN. Your exemptions for large incomes are entirely too generous.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. VESTAL].

Mr. VESTAL. Mr. Chairman, in the consideration of this revenue bill it may be presumption upon my part to say anything, but I feel that in justice to my own conscience and to the thousands of persons in the industrial plants in this country I ought to say a word concerning my position. I am opposed to this bill in its present form and shall vote against it unless it is materially modified.

I am sure that we all have the greatest regard for the gentlemen upon this committee, their wisdom, and their patriotism. The distinguished gentleman from North Carolina, the chairman of this committee, however, made a very broad statement in his eloquent appeal in behalf of this measure, in substance, that the men who would oppose this measure of raising this much revenue by increasing the taxes were unpatriotic. In other words, that we of to-day should bear the burden and that future generations should be relieved of the greater portion of the same. I agree with him that we should bear a part, of course, of this burden, but I believe it is more patriotic to so arrange the burden that the industries of this country will be saved that we may have a source of revenue next year and the year after and during the years to come. I believe it is more patriotic to let the industries live, that employment may be given to the thousands of men who depend upon their employment, and the wages they receive to support their families. I may be unduly excited about this matter, but I do not think I am. In my judgment this bill as it now is will put out of business a great many industries in this country, or at least so lessen their activities that thousands of men will be thrown out of employment, and, with food prices as they now are, and getting higher every day, there will be hunger, suffering, and starvation in store for these men.

In my judgment the principle of a 5 per cent tax on gross sales is wrong. I think the tax ought to be on profits. The 5 per cent tax on gross sales would not hurt the big fellow so much probably, but it would, in my judgment, in many instances put the smaller industries out of business. If the tax were on the profit it seems to me at least it would be more just.

It is not so much the men who are at the head of these industries that I am thinking about; it is the man in the plant or in the industry who is depending upon his employment for his living. The manufacturer can in the majority of cases stand it. He can go out of business and still live, but the man who is employed if out of work for a week, two weeks, or a month will be brought to the point of suffering.

In the first place I do not believe we should raise this large sum of money by taxation. And in the second place I think we should only raise the amount we need. And in the third place a great many of the discriminations that are made in this bill should be eliminated.

The only justification of this measure that I have heard is the bare statement that we must have the money. The greater number of the advocates of the bill say they are going to close their eyes and vote for certain items in it. I think practically every member of the committee who has spoken in favor of the bill has made substantially this statement, with the exception of the gentleman from Connecticut, who has made bold to say he was going to vote for it with his eyes open. If the measure is so unjust, so full of inequalities that members of the committee who framed the bill must close their eyes and stifle their consciences to support it, if the best reason they can give and the most convincing argument they can produce is the bare statement that we need the money, I think we should hesitate before casting our vote for the measure.

I do not want to be placed in the attitude of not wanting to raise money to finance this war, but I am objecting to the amount of money proposed to be raised at this time, the inequalities in the bill, and the method used to raise the same.

The statement made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] as to the amount of money needed and which should be raised seems to be fair and has not been successfully controverted. Instead of $1,800,000,000, we need, according to the statement of the gentleman from Illinois, about $1,100,000,000, and I believe this amount could be raised in such a way that no industry in this country would be endangered, and I believe that the inequalities could in a great measure be eradicated. That inequalities exist and that discriminations are made is an admitted fact, but when these discriminations are brought to the attention of the committee, they answer, we need the money.

For instance, take section 504 of this bill, which seeks to levy a 5 per cent tax on the industry engaged in the business of advertising through billboards, electric signs, painted signs, and car signs, in fact all advertising except in newspapers and magazines. The tax proposed by this section reaches less than 4 per cent of the total gross income of the entire advertising industry.

I desire to read into the RECORD the affidavit of a number of gentlemen engaged in the advertising industry sought to be taxed under this section of the bill. They are thoroughly conversant with the business, are experts in this line; they say that their knowledge of the facts is based upon books of account and statistics collected by them on this subject, and upon authentic data collected by different advertising associations, and upon actual experience, extending through a period of many years of active work in the advertising field:

It is a fact that the total amount of money expended by the American public for advertising is approximately the sum of $800,000,000 annually. Of this amount at least the sum of $770,000,000 is expended for advertising in newspapers, trade journals, farm papers, magazines, and periodicals. The balance of $30,000,000 is divided as follows: $8,000,000 for billboards, $8,500,000 for painted outdoor and electric signs, $6,000,000 for street-car advertising, and $7,500,000 for miscellaneous advertising, such as theater programs, handbills, tin signs, sporting news announcements, etc.

Therefore the tax proposed by the bill reaches less than 4 per cent of the total gross income of the entire advertising industry.

EDMUND W. WHITEHEAD,
Notary Public, District of Columbia.

Can the committee explain why the $30,000,000 should be taxed, or, in other words, why the outside advertising industry, representing business amounting to $30,000,000, should be taxed and the larger amount, $770,000,000, be exempt?

You say you justify this on the ground that the newspapers, trade journals, magazines, and so forth, are hit hard enough by a different sort of tax, but you must admit you are taxing 4 per cent of the gross income of the advertising industry and exempting 96 per cent. With this discriminating 5 per cent tax against this industry it will be put out of business completely. Why? A man comes to an outdoor advertiser to make a contract. In quoting the rate the advertiser will say, "You will have to pay an increase of 5 per cent on account of this tax." The prospective purchaser will refuse to pay it, because he can advertise through the medium of the newspapers and magazines without paying the extra 5 per cent. The purchaser of advertising will buy where he can buy the cheapest, providing he can accomplish the same purpose.

You propose by this bill to collect upon 4 per cent of the gross income of the advertising business 5 per cent, or about $1,500,000, when, in fact, you will have destroyed the business altogether. If you would levy a tax upon the profits or income, while it would be just as unfair and discriminating, their industry would not be destroyed.

This class of citizens is not unpatriotic, and I believe they would, without exception, cheerfully give to the Government all their income, outside of a living, but they have a right to object to having their business destroyed.

A great deal has been said about the automobile industry, and that the proposed tax would not in any wise affect their business; that the extra 5 per cent would be passed on to the purchaser and the manufacturer would not be injured. I believe, with the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. DOREMUS], that when men make those statements they merely guess at the proposition and do not know the facts. I have had handed me by Mr. Crow, president of the Crow-Elkhart Motor Co., of Elkhart, Ind., a very comprehensive statement of actual conditions in automobile manufacturing. It is as follows:

GENERAL STATEMENT OF ACTUAL CONDITIONS IN AUTOMOBILE MANUFACTURING AND REASONS WHY 5 PER CENT TAX ON SELLING PRICE OF AUTOMOBILES IS PROHIBITORY TO THE SMALL AUTOMOBILE MANUFACTURER.

Number of automobile manufacturers in the United States	450
80 per cent automobiles manufactured by 12 concerns	12
20 per cent manufactured by remaining number of manufacturers	438

These 438 automobile factories produce but 20 per cent of the whole number of cars made. The Crow-Elkhart Motor Co. is one of these 438 producers.

The tremendous advance of materials used in 1917 over 1916 is illustrated as follows:

Materials	1916	1917
Cost sheet steel	$3.85	$10.00
Cost bar cold-rolled steel, average	2.80	7.70
Cost lumber, per thousand	74.00	85.00
Cost of tires, per car	45.00	51.75
Cost of artificial leather, per yard	.99	1.45
Cost of bearings, each	2.02	3.24
Cost of cast iron, per pound	.02½	.04½
Cost of malleable castings, per pound	.05½	.08
Cost of aluminum castings, per pound	.35	.80
Cost of brass castings, per pound	.21	.35
Cost of cotton ounce duck, per yard	.14½	.32½
Cost of moss for cushions, per pound	.05½	.08
Cost of excelsior (mineral wool), per ton	26.00	55.00
Cost of cushion spring steel, per set	2.00	3.25
Cost of linoleum, per yard	.62	.87
Cost of steam coal, per ton	2.60	4.75

Cost of paint, general advance, 25 per cent.

Cost of turpentine, linseed oil, solder, etc., general advance, 75 per cent.

Cost of hardware for auto construction, wood screws, cap screws, etc., general advance, 50 per cent.

Labor, skilled and unskilled, general advance, 25 per cent.

General overhead, due to transportation conditions alone, general advance, 33⅓ per cent.

The cost of the raw material has, as you see, increased more than 50 per cent, and, on account of the war, the prices of material will probably go higher. The volume of sales has decreased about 30 per cent. Mr. Crow states that the net profit to his company in 1916, based on the list price of $795 per car, was $49.85. He states that he has added $50 to the list price in 1917, making the list price of the car $845, the $50 being added to take care of the increased cost of material, labor, and so forth. Upon this basis a tax of 5 per cent on the selling price of this car would, by calculation, leave a margin of net profit of 1 per cent. With the increased cost of materials and the uncertainties, I believe this proposed tax would not only prevent the Crow-Elkhart Motor Co. from making any profit, but would compel it to suspend business, thereby putting a great number of workmen out of employment. If these facts, given by the president of this company, are true—and I have every reason to believe they are—they are typical of the other 437 automobile manufacturers. The same condition is true with regard to the Madison Motors Co., of Anderson, Ind., and the Inter-State Motor Co., of Muncie, Ind. While the 12 large concerns might get by with the 5 per cent tax added, all the smaller companies would find themselves in the same condition as the Crow-Elkhart Co., and, in my judgment, a great number of them at least would suspend business, and hence, as far as these industries are concerned, the very object of the bill would be defeated.

What is true of these industries I have mentioned is in a measure true of a number of other industries taxed under the provisions of this bill.

The tax sought to be imposed upon newspapers by the proposed zone system can not be justified except by the same argument always used by the committee, "We need the money." The rate proposed is an increase of from 100 to 400 per cent, and this tax, added to the increased cost of paper, puts an unjust burden upon the publishers of newspapers, and as the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. KNUTSON] has well said amounts to practically a tax on education. I am informed that the normal price of news print paper is about $40 per ton. Under the proposed bill this amount will be charged for moving a ton of printed sheets to any part of the first zone, no difference whether the distance be 1 mile or 300 miles. If it is carried to the outer zone the charge amounts to $120 per ton, or three times the cost of print paper.

I do not believe that newspapers should escape their just share of taxes to help support this Government, but I believe the tax proposed under the zone system is unjust and will have the effect of throwing a number of publishers into bankruptcy. I believe the zone system should be eliminated, and a slight flat increase of postage charged on second-class mail matter, and I believe that no news publisher would object to paying his fair share of the taxes necessary to carry on this war.

It is my judgment that the greater part of the money necessary to be raised should be raised from incomes and from excess profits. The burden will then be placed where it rightfully belongs, and no patriotic citizen will object to the taking of a great per cent of his income to support the country that has given him the opportunity to produce such income. This method would insure the safety of our institutions during the period of the war, and leave them on a solid footing when the war is over. True patriotism does not consist in merely saying, "We must have the money," and then shutting our eyes and taxing everything in sight without regard to the future, but in levying a tax that will not only provide for the men who do the fighting at the front but so safeguard our institutions that the opportunity of earning a living shall not be denied the men at home.

And so I contend that it is far better and more patriotic to extend a part of this war indebtedness over a period of years and keep our industrial and business institutions intact that they may keep labor employed, and so have a chance to earn money with which to pay this indebtedness. In other words, save the goose that lays the golden egg, so the egg may be used. Do not kill the goose and lose both.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLACK]. [Applause.]

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House, I do not intend to use the time that the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] has allotted me in indulging in any criticism of this bill. I think I have heard more mournful talk during the debate on this war-tax measure than I have heard during the consideration of any other measure since I have been a Member of this House. I think, speaking as an individual Member, that I have received more letters, more telegrams, and more circulars of protest coming from those who are against taxation provided for in this bill than concerning any other measure that we have had before us. Most of these letters and telegrams and circulars start out about like this:

"My Dear Sir: We realize that the country is at war, and we want you to understand that we patriotically stand by the Government. Furthermore, we know that a great deal of money has got to be raised; but—." And then they go on to explain why their particular industry ought not to be taxed. Now, in respect to this, here is about the conclusion that I have come to: These gentlemen have my most sincere sympathy, and I have given what they had to say my very careful consideration, but I am going to vote for this bill on final passage. [Applause.]

The members of the Ways and Means Committee of the House have wrestled with this problem long and hard, and, while I do not approve of every feature of the bill and expect to see it amended in some particular features, I intend to stand behind it on final passage, whether I am in accord with all of its provisions or not.

Now, the gentleman from New York [Mr. LUNN], who has just delivered a very able speech from his viewpoint of the bill, took the position that this measure will draw from the consuming public several hundred million dollars. Now, I contend that is an exaggerated statement, because I know and he should know that the very reason that we are receiving so many protests from some of those who are specially interested in this bill is because they know that it taxes them in such a way that they can not pass it on to the consumer. Now, I can illustrate that point in this way by a practical illustration from the bill itself.

Let us take the 5 cents tax provided for on telegraph and telephone messages. It is well known that this will be paid by the consumer, and, in fact, it was so intended by the Ways and Means Committee. But suppose the tax had been levied in such a way that it could not have been passed on to the consumer, do not ever doubt but that we would have been receiving letters and telegrams of protest from the telegraph and telephone companies before now.

Mr. STEAGALL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLACK. I have but a short time, but will yield for a moment.

Mr. STEAGALL. Section 503 expressly says that the tax imposed by section 500 shall be paid by the person, corporation, partnership, or association paying for the services or facilities rendered.

Mr. BLACK. Yes; I know that, and it was so intended by the committee. Every consumer will pay it as directed, but you are not receiving protests as to that section. At least, I am not, I will say to the gentleman from New York. Most of the protests which I am receiving are coming from the industries which know they will have to pay the tax and can not pass it on to the consumer. Now, in this connection, permit me to say that I heartily approve the income, the inheritance, and the excess-profits taxes provided for in this bill. It has been strongly contended by some of the Members who have spoken in this debate and is being agitated in the newspapers that we ought not to collect so much money by taxation, but should raise a larger portion of the war expenses by bond issues. I do not agree with that contention. I believe that the gentleman from North Carolina was right when he stated in the course of his remarks last Thursday that one-half of the expenses of this war should be borne by taxation, and not over one-half of it should be saddled as a load on posterity by long-term bond issues.

Any other method would create a favored, tax-exempt bond-holding class, to which future generations would have to pay tribute. Already 2 per cent of the population of the United States own 65 per cent of its wealth; and if we should permit the wealthier classes to still further transfer large amounts of their funds to tax-exempt securities, would it be fair to the people? That, gentlemen, is the question which we will have to meet during the continuance of this war, and we must meet it in the interest of the masses of the people and not any favored few.

Now, I will not undertake to go into a discussion of the details of this bill. My time would be entirely too short for that. What I want to do is to refer briefly to some statements that the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] made on the floor of the House yesterday. Now, the gentleman from Pennsylvania is an eloquent speaker and a very likable colleague, but like all good men he sometimes has a bad day, and yesterday was one of his bad days. I do not often indulge in a colloquy with a Member during his speech, but he made some statements as to the payment of income taxes in the South that caused me to immediately rise and challenge his statement. Now, I do not intend to refer to this matter because of any sectional feeling which I entertain, because I have no sectional feeling.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLACK. I will.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I think, if the gentleman will remember, I carefully avoided using the word "South" at all. I have too much affection for it. I referred to geographical conditions and named certain States in comparison with other States.

Mr. BLACK. I will get to the point if the gentleman will wait. The gentleman is always an adroit speaker and is as skilled in the manipulation of words as any Member of the House, and so he took up some figures and showed that a certain section of the country, naming a few Northern and Eastern States, paid a certain amount of income tax, and then he took up some more figures and showed that another section, naming the Southern States, paid a certain amount of income tax, and then by this comparison made the inferential charge that the people in the South were tax dodgers.

Now, then, as I have said, I have no sectional feeling whatever in this matter, because just as one stone laid well upon the other makes the massive structure when completed, with all of its beauty and symmetry, just so do the people of the North and the South and the East and the West make this great Commonwealth what it is to-day. Old Uncle Sam, with his great big heart, has room enough to take us all in. It is quite true that the great State of Pennsylvania, for which I have much admiration, pays a larger amount of income tax than does the State of Texas. It is true that it is more densely populated, and your people turn their attention to mining and manufacturing and other gainful occupations and have amassed great wealth, and I do not begrudge them their good fortune. On the other hand, the pioneers that came to Texas have taken the broad prairies covered with grass and have turned them into waving fields of wheat and nodding fields of corn and snowy banks of cotton and are rapidly turning it into one of the greatest agricultural sections in the world. And I submit that the fruit of their toil is just as important to the Nation as are the mining and manufacturing industries of the great Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, rich, as they are, in their highly developed state.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Now will the gentleman yield? If I could speak as eloquently about Texas as the gentleman does, I would gladly do so. He is using language that I could never attempt to match in a description of the glories of his own territory, and I hope he will ever be as true to the Lone Star State as I am trying to be true to Pennsylvania. [Applause.]

Mr. BLACK. I thank the gentleman from Pennsylvania. But the part of his speech delivered yesterday which I finally wanted to get down to was that part of it where he said he was going to propose a consumption tax on cotton of $2.50 a bale. He seems to begrudge the South the small amount of prosperity that we have recently had because our great staple has gone to 20 cents a pound.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. No; I glory in that.

Mr. BLACK. I do not like the gentleman's kind of glory. He forgets that in 1914, when nature smiled upon us, and under the benign influence of the sunshine and the rain, we made the greatest crop in our history—16,500,000 bales—and that we were penalized by marketing conditions for our very thrift and had to sell that crop at an average price of $10 a bale less than it cost to produce it. And yet I say that if it had not been for that crop of 16,500,000 bales that our southern farmers made that year of 1914 we would to-day have a cotton famine, not only in the United States but throughout the world. Does any man here doubt that proposition? It was the carry-over from 1914 that has saved the day.

And I suggest another thing, that if it had not been for the 8,000,000 tons, or thereabouts, of cotton seed that were crushed in the South that year lard compound and other shortening would to-day be beyond the reach of the average poor man. It is high enough as it is; but what would have been the condition if it had not been for that year's great production?

Cotton is not a local asset. I hope that the membership of this House and the people of the United States realize that it is a national asset. Just as the great lumber forests of the Pacific coast, just as the great orange groves of California, just as the great wheat fields and corn fields of the Middle West, just as the wonderful factories and industries of the North and East are national assets, just so is the great cotton crop of the South a national asset. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. MILLER].

Mr. MILLER of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I am a believer in the principle that in time of war the heaviest burden of taxation should be borne by those whose percentage of profit has been and will be greatest. In other words, it should visit the heaviest tax burden upon those who have received and will receive the greatest benefit from the commercial activities incident to war. The greatest of all the great fortunes amassed by Americans are those flowing from industrial pursuits. One has but to look at the list of multimillionaires of America to be convinced of this. If one should ask me what are the sources of the greatest of all American fortunes, I should answer the manufacturer, the merchant, and the carrier. Comparatively few great fortunes of the present generation come from other sources. Who ever heard of a multimillionaire farmer who amassed his fortune by tilling the soil? Who ever heard of a multimillionaire professional man amassing millions by following strictly his professional calling? Where is there, in this broad land, a farmer whose net income from farming exceeds a million dollars a year? Where is there a professional man whose strict professional income exceeds that same figure? It is true, a very few great fortunes have come from banking and a few other callings, but the number is small when compared with that wonderful fortune-amassing trilogy of the manufacturer, the merchant, and the carrier of goods and people. Who in America has made the greatest amount of money out of the war in Europe so far? My answer would be this same trilogy. Who will reap the greatest benefits from the continuation of the war activities? My answer would be these same gentlemen. Why, then, should we not visit the greatest proportional burden of the war upon those who have received the greatest benefit? Tax the fortune according to its earning capacity. [Applause.]

I know some will point to a few banking houses which have made great fortunes, with the name of Morgan & Co. first in the list; but, gentlemen, governmental agencies of warring nations will not be as popular in America in the next few years as they have been in the past two and a half years. And if you tax the fortune according to its earning capacity you will catch these bankers as well as all others.

It occurs to me that in these days we should—that is, the Government should—receive the benefits of the fortune-making proclivities of these people. While the man of moderate means, and indeed the man of no means except the earnings of his daily toil, will form the rank and file of the Army and the Navy as a conscript, if you please, why should we not conscript a part of—the major part of—the profits or earnings of the men who do not go to war, but, on the contrary, stay at home and make money? If the poor man has to furnish the blood, why not make the rich man furnish the money in greater proportion to his means than the other? This is not socialism, this is not un-American, it is simply common sense and common honesty between man and man, between the citizen and his Government.

I should favor the raising of the percentage on net incomes between $500,000 and $1,000,000 to 65 per cent and increasing the percentage on net incomes of over $1,000,000 to at least 80 per cent. We touch no part of his property, no part of his investment; we simply say to him, "You can not in these war times—you very rich man—you can not go on accumulating as in times of peace; you must be content—you very rich man—with your fortune, without adding materially to it." We should say to him, "You get the most out of our Government, out of our institutions; it is therefore but fair that you should contribute most." While we, in common with every nation of the world, will be and are straining every resource of our Government, why should not every citizen bear a burden in proportion to his ability to bear it? There is no reason in equity or morals why he should not; equity and morals are crying out that he should.

If a world peace is made more secure as a result of this war, if our institutions are made more permanent, the man of great wealth will be the greatest beneficiary, for then his accumulations will go on thenceforth uninterruptedly. The thousands and millions of soldiers who will engage in the war will—those who are not filling unknown graves—come home far poorer, from a financial basis, than when they marched away. Is there justice in permitting the very wealthy to go on accumulating wealth while the soldiers at the front are becoming poorer every day?

The value of individual wealth to the Nation depends upon the use the individual makes of that wealth. The wealth of an individual is of little value to the Nation in time of stress and trial if the Nation can not in some way use that wealth. A thousand million dollars, the property of individuals, is of little if any use to a nation if locked in a safe-deposit vault. It seems to me that the multimillionaire ought in all good conscience be satisfied if his fortune is secured to him while this war is on; he ought to be satisfied. I do not believe in the confiscation of wealth, but I do believe in making it bear its part, its just and proper share of the governmental burden. I do not believe in confiscating the life of an individual, but the law enacted by this Congress has decreed that the individual, the body of the individual, must bear its proper share of the governmental burden.

Some may ask the question, "If you take in tax the major portion of the income of the very wealthy, who will buy our bonds?" My answer to that question is, the more you raise in taxes the less, automatically, will be the amount of bonds to be bought.

I can not conceive of the patriotism in the heart of the very wealthy man who, taking advantage of the convulsion our country is now in, will want to go on accumulating his fortune. If that is patriotism, then what shall we call the impulse—the studied desire, if you please—of the hundreds of thousands of men who are freely expressing their wish to fill the Army and Navy?

There is another provision in this bill which every Member of this body should carefully consider—that is, the advertising clause, section 504.

It occurs to me there should be no discrimination between different forms of advertising. It is absolutely unfair that the newspapers and periodicals should pay no revenue while all other forms of advertising are taxed 5 per cent on the amount received. I am informed that there is a publication—the Ladies' Home Journal—which charges $126 per inch, single column, for each insertion, while the current rate in the ordinary magazine is from $25 to $75. Yet these periodicals pay no war revenue other than the increase in postage. It occurs to me this is wrong. This is a gross discrimination against the outdoor advertiser. I must suggest to the distinguished committee which framed this measure that if it is just to tax the outdoor advertiser 5 per cent gross on his income it would be equally just to tax the indoor advertiser at the same rate.

The increased postage will, in my judgment, cut little figure with the better established and wealthier publications. My idea would be to discriminate between newspapers and magazines. The daily newspaper is inherently different from the magazine. The reading matter is assembled at far greater cost; it serves an entirely different purpose. I should favor far less tax on newspaper advertisements than on magazine, but I would tax all—out-of-door, the billboard, the newspaper, the magazine, the pamphlet, and all forms of advertising on the income derived therefrom. By this plan, which is fair and equitable, there would be an enormous revenue.

I am afraid the committee has overlooked one of the most fruitful sources of revenue. The American people will have little complaint if all are treated alike—all forms of the same general class of business taxed the same.

I must protest against the discrimination visited upon the out-of-doors advertisers, and I equally protest against the immunity of the newspaper and magazine. I should offset this income against the increased postage rate so that the latter will be materially lessened while the net revenue to the Government will be substantially the same. At the proper time I shall offer suitable amendments on at least these two items. [Applause.]

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH].

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Chairman, already so much time has been taken up in the debate on this bill that I did not intend to speak, believing that opportunity would be offered me when the bill is considered under the five-minute rule to make my observations on some of the provisions of which I do not approve. But yesterday, in my absence for a short time from the floor of the House, the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEENERSON] saw fit to devote a great portion of his time to one of our great commercial firms in the United States, namely, Sears, Roebuck & Co., and its president, Mr. Julius Rosenwald.

I arise not for the purpose of defending that firm or this wonderfully charitable and patriotic gentleman, Mr. Rosenwald, as neither needs any defense at my or any other man's hand, but I arise for the purpose of correcting certain misstatements and insinuations made by the gentleman from Minnesota.

In his speech he has insinuated that this firm is being permitted to ship catalogues to given points in carload lots and then to distribute them locally by parcel post, thereby securing special benefits under the present law.

Only five minutes ago, through the courtesy of the gentleman from New York, I have received from the Post Office Department a statement, which I shall take the liberty of reading, and which will clearly demonstrate that the statements made by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEENERSON] are not founded on facts. This is what the department has to say:

I find upon examination of our records that Sears, Roebuck & Co., of Chicago, mailed approximately 7,000,000 of their large catalogues during the past year, of which number about 1,000,000 were mailed at Chicago and the others were shipped to their distributing points. The rates on parcel post are so adjusted that the net revenue per pound is practically the same, no matter to which zone shipped, and while the gross revenue would be less when shipped by freight to distributing points and then placed in the mails, the net revenue would be more. In addition to these large catalogues this firm also distributes millions of smaller catalogues twice a year, which are distributed from the Chicago plant. This company does not ship any of its merchandise to distributing points by freight for the purpose of mailing. The postage on the parcels mailed by Sears, Roebuck & Co. at Chicago alone amounts to about $2,500,000 per annum. Notwithstanding the very large amount of postage paid by this concern, it is not given any preference over any other firm, corporation, or individual. Many others distribute their catalogues and some ship their merchandise in the same manner as the company mentioned.

The flat rate of 1 cent for each 2 ounces or fraction thereof which prevailed for catalogues before books were placed in the parcel post did not meet the cost of handling and transportation and they were handled at a loss. The change in the classification of books, which includes catalogues, from third-class matter to parcel post has enabled the department to handle this class of mail at a profit, which before was handled at a loss.

The shipment to certain distributing points by freight and then placing the matter in the mail has not been made possible by order of the Postmaster General, but by the law authorizing the parcel post, which was enacted by the Congress, and which established a zone system. The Government does not have a monopoly on the transportation of fourth-class matter, and any person has a right under the law to ship it a part of the distance either by freight or express and then place it in the mail if he so desires.

No discrimination has been shown by the department in favor of any individual, firm, or corporation in handling their mail, and a single parcel mailed by the individual receives the same consideration as the parcels mailed by the largest concerns.

This report shows beyond any doubt that the firm in question has in no wise taken advantage of the Government or that the Government sustained any loss in handling the business. The literature mailed did not come under the provisions of the second-class rate.

This will suffice as to the statements made against the firm of Sears, Roebuck & Co., but I am more concerned over the unfair and unjust remarks and insinuations made against the president of that firm, Mr. Julius Rosenwald.

The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEENERSON], in trying to be witty, said, among other things, the following:

Now, the principal man in Sears, Roebuck & Co. lives in Chicago. His name is Julius Rosenwald, and I did not know what he would do when I said two years ago, in discussing the catalogue business, that if he did not pay a big sum to the Democratic campaign fund he was an ingrate. [Laughter.] He does not appear as a contributor, but he has served on one of the finance committees of the Democratic campaign, and he is a member of the National Defense League.

Now, I wish to state to the gentleman from Minnesota that if he knew Mr. Rosenwald and knew of his standing, character, and reputation in Chicago, he would not have made these offensive statements about him. It is apparent that the gentleman from Minnesota has but a vague knowledge of Mr. Rosenwald, as, in the first place, he is not a Democrat. I regret it exceedingly [laughter], as the only mistake that I ever knew him to make was when he joined and assisted the Republican Party in the last two campaigns. He all the time has been a Republican, and therefore he never could have served on any Democratic committee. But the gentleman from Minnesota tried to make it appear that because of his service on a Democratic committee and on account of the service he rendered to the Democratic Party he and his firm secured special advantages and the President appointed him on this great advisory commission.

In answer thereto I wish to say this: That President Wilson desired to select the most efficient and the best-posted men in this country for service on the commission, and after a careful survey of all the available and fit men, notwithstanding the fact that Mr. Rosenwald had opposed him in the election, he requested that gentleman to serve on the National Defense League. I assure you he is serving the country there to the best of his ability, without any compensation whatever, not only to his own credit but to the credit of the administration and of the country. Not only does he volunteer his own services to the country but out of his own pocket he pays the compensated assistants that are working under him.

In addition, I wish to say that there is no man in the United States who has done more for the needy people of this Nation, and even of foreign nations, than he. At all times he is ready and willing to contribute his share, and more than his share, toward aiding and assisting those who are oppressed and persecuted not only in this but other lands. I therefore regret exceedingly that the gentleman from Minnesota has seen fit to attack this splendid, high-minded citizen of ours. We who know him in the city of Chicago honor and esteem him for his splendid deeds, for the splendid work which he has done, and for his splendid efforts in behalf of humanity. I regret that the gentleman from Minnesota is not here now, because if he were on the floor now I would demand of him to retract the insinuations or the statements he has made against Mr. Rosenwald.

I think, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, that it is manifestly unfair and unjust for any Member of Congress, simply because he has the privilege of the floor and the privilege of speech here, to be permitted to assail any man without any justification whatever. Gentlemen, that is the reason I have requested your indulgence, and I hope that in the future not only the gentleman from Minnesota but any other Member of this body, before taking the floor for the purpose of attacking a man, will first ascertain whether his insinuations or attacks are justified. [Applause.] In this case I know that they were not only not justified but they were unwarranted and in most respects untrue and unmerited. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I was going to yield five minutes to the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. DALE], but I find he is not here. That cleans the slate on this side.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the Clerk read the first section, and then I will move that the committee rise.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc.,

Mr. MARTIN. I ask unanimous consent that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with, that it be read for amendment, and that the committee amendments be first considered.

Mr. CUMMINS. Will the Senator from Virginia yield to me long enough to submit a resolution and have it referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce. I am anxious to have it reach the committee before Friday morning.

Mr. MARTIN. I yield for that purpose.

Whereas it is desirable that the inquiry hereinafter requested shall include all the facts and circumstances relating to the financial transactions of the Boston & Maine Railroad, the organization of the Boston Railroad Holding Co., the deposit of the stock of the Boston Railroad Holding Co. in the hands of trustees, the appointment of a receiver for the Boston & Maine Railroad, the consolidation with leased lines, the organization and financing of the Hampden Railroad Corporation, and all other matters connected with the main inquiry: Therefore be it

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a joint memorial of the Legislature of the Territory of Alaska, which will be incorporated in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Territories.

The joint memorial is as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY FOR THE TERRITORY OF ALASKA,
Juneau, Alaska, May 3, 1917.

PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES SENATE,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: By direction of the Alaska Territorial Legislature, now in session, I have the honor to send you herewith a certified copy of committee substitute for senate joint resolution No. 1.

Yours, very truly,

CHARLES E. DAVIDSON,
Secretary of Alaska.

Committee substitute for senate joint resolution 1.

Be it resolved by the Senate of the Alaska Legislature (the House of Representatives concurring), That the creation of reservations extending over the public waters of the United States, whether for the purpose of securing monopolistic fishing rights for the benefit of Indians or whites, are inimical not only to the best interests of all the inhabitants of the Territory of Alaska, Indians as well as whites, but also to those of the whole people of the United States.

The Alaska fisheries are among the largest in the world, many millions of dollars having been invested in them. They have added to the industrial well-being of Alaska by giving employment to thousands of fishermen, including both whites and Indians; they have added to the food supply of the Nation by filling the markets of trade with a food product that is at once cheap, palatable, and nutritious.

Commercial fishing is carried on at advantageous points along the shores of most of the islands as well as those of the mainland. These shores are dotted with Indian villages, many of which are larger than the village of the Metlakahtlans, for whose benefit an exclusive and monopolistic fishery has been created. The inhabitants of these Indian villages belong to different tribes, but the individuals of one tribe do not differ from those of another. All the coast Indians, including the Metlakahtlans, have the same characteristic.

There is no reason why the Metlakahtlans, who were inhabitants of British Columbia at the time Alaska was purchased from Russia, should be given monopolistic fishing privileges in the water surrounding Annette Island, when similar rights are not conferred upon the native tribes who resided in Alaska at the time of its purchase.

The Government of the United States owes no duty to a tribe of British Columbia Indians that it does not owe to the native tribes of Alaska. Yet if the monopolistic rights conferred upon the Metlakahtlans were also conferred upon the other tribes with respect to the waters surrounding the various islands and washing the shores of the mainland inhabited by them from time immemorial the white fishermen would lose their employment and means of livelihood and be compelled to retire from the field.

These invasions of the public right of fishery are not only destructive of the rights and privileges of the whites but they confer no benefit upon the Indians. The Indian, like the white man, is the product of his environment. The change wrought in the environment of the Alaska Indian by the advent of the white man has transformed the roving savage into the miner, fisherman, carpenter, and in many instances into the highly skilled mechanic. The development of the fisheries and mines of Alaska has brought the Indian in contact with the new and improved surroundings, and the progress he has made in the race for civilization has been measured in each locality by the extent of the change there wrought.

These rights, ostensibly reserved for the Indian, do not inure to his benefit. In the case of the Annette Island Reservation, a contract was made with a white cannery man, under which the latter, upon making certain payments to the Bureau of Education, has been given the right to enjoy the monopolistic fishing privileges originally reserved to the Metlakahtlan Indians.

These reservations destroy the use value of the fisheries so situated, that they must depend for their supply upon fish caught from the waters from which these owners are excluded, and they destroy to a large extent the sale or market value of all other fisheries, wherever and however situated. In the case of the Annette Island Reservation, one cannery, at least, was dependent to a large extent for its supply upon fish caught from these waters.

The inauguration of this new policy on the part of the Federal Government has injured the stability of the remaining Alaska fisheries not thus directly affected. These, likewise, depend for their fish supply upon the exercise of the common right of fishery, a policy that places this right in jeopardy and is such that its extension may at any time prevent its exercise in any locality, impairs the value of fisheries wherever situated. No one knows who will be the last to stand or the first to fall. The policy destroys those directly affected and menaces all others: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the President, Secretary of the Interior, Secretary of the Bureau of Fisheries, and the Congress be, and they are hereby, petitioned to take such steps as may be necessary to restore to the people of Alaska that ancient right of fishery enjoyed by all those living under the protection of the common law since Magna Charta, by which that right was recognized and confirmed, and to that end that all monopolistic fishing privileges, whether resulting from reservations of the public waters or otherwise, be abolished, so that all may exercise this natural right upon an equal footing.

Senate joint memorial 13.

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled:

Your memorialists, the Legislature of the Territory of Alaska, in third regular session assembled, do most respectfully represent—

Whereas there are known to be in southeastern and western Alaska many millions of tons of magnetic and chrome iron ore, containing more or less values in copper, with which is associated gold, silver, and molybdenite, the ownership of such bodies being widely distributed among prospectors, small companies, and citizens of Alaska; and

Whereas there is now no means of saving this iron ore, and it is mined and shipped only for its contents of copper, gold, and silver, the iron being thrown on the slag dumps as waste; and

Whereas the people of the Pacific Northwest and Alaska have to pay a heavy advance over the eastern prices for all iron and steel products; and

Whereas the present copper smelters charge exorbitant rates and pay nothing for the iron ore which is thrown away; and

Whereas the smelting of Alaskan ores is either done or dominated by but one American company, of whom various producers have complained of unfair treatment; and

Whereas this magnetic iron ore may be saved by crushing and concentration, and by reason of extremely cheap hydroelectric power to be had in Alaska may be smelted in electric furnaces and converted into steel pig, thus becoming a national asset, besides stimulating mining as well as agricultural and various industries; and

Whereas private capital is not available for this enterprise and the Smelter Trust will not save nor pay for this iron so long as they do not own the ore bodies; and

Whereas a milling and smelting plant of about 200 tons daily capacity for the first unit installed by the Government under the direction of the Bureau of Mines could concentrate this ore, save the iron, copper, and other values, produce a substantial revenue for the Government, and assist the mining industry: Therefore be it

Resolved by the Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Alaska, That we, your memorialists, respectfully request that a Government milling and smelting plant be established in Alaska and operated under the direction of the Bureau of Mines for the purpose of treating the ores above described and other ores of the Territory of Alaska; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy hereof be sent to the President of the United States Senate, Speaker of the United States House of Representatives, Delegate to Congress to the House of Representatives from Alaska, and the Chief of the Bureau of Mines at Washington, D. C.

And for favorable consideration of this petition your memorialists shall ever pray.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a joint memorial of the Legislature of the Territory of Alaska, which will be incorporated in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Territories.

The joint memorial is as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY FOR THE TERRITORY OF ALASKA,
Juneau, Alaska, May 3, 1917.

PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES SENATE,
Washington, D. C.

SIR: By direction of the Alaska Territorial Legislature, now in session, I have the honor to send you herewith a certified copy of house joint memorial No. 9.

Yours, very truly, CHARLES E. DAVIDSON,
Secretary of Alaska.

House joint memorial 9.

To the President of the United States, the United States Senate, the United States House of Representatives, and to the Delegate in Congress from Alaska:

Your memorialists, the Senate and House of Representatives of the Territory of Alaska, respectfully represent that—

As representing the people of the Territory of Alsaka, your memorialists would most respectfully direct the attention of the United States Government to the need and feasibility of dredging a canal or deepening the channel across Dry Straits as a route for steamers and shipping in the Inside Passage, preferable to the present route via Wrangell Narrows.

Dry Straits lies between Mitkof Island and the tide flats adjoining the mouth of the Stikine River.

Running from Kadin Island (High Island), at a point 4 miles from Wrangell, into Frederick Sound near the northern end of Dry Island, a total distance of 9 miles, there is a channel for fishing boats across Dry Straits at high tide, but it is dry at low tide and the bottom is composed of sand and soil deposits through which it would be easy to cut a channel with a dredge. A jetty 5 miles long, to extend from Kadin Island to Dry Island, would effectively block out and stop the flow at high tide from the Stikine River and would add a large agricultural area to the five thousand-odd acres of clear farm land now lying waiting for the investor and settler at the mouth of this river.

The possibilities and advantage of a deep-water canal in Dry Straits have long been recognized by navigators and local authorities.

In response to the activities of the Wrangell Chamber of Commerce in the year 1905 (and which received the support of Congressman Humphrey of Washington), the United States Government had a naval officer of the United States Navy make a special visit to investigate the Dry Straits proposition. The examination made by this naval officer consisted in the spending of one day on the ground, and his opinion, while undoubtedly favorable from an engineering standpoint, discouraged immediate construction at that time (1905), as he thought the traffic was not large enough to warrant the expense of building a canal.

Development since 1905, however, in commerce and shipping, and the large increase in business generally, in southeastern Alaska during the past 12 years together with the prospects for the future under the Government policy of opening up Alaska, leaves no doubt in our minds that the time has arrived to dredge the Dry Straits Canal. We believe that the interests involved are now more than great enough to justify the cost.

The route now traveled by steamers on the southeastern run is through Wrangell Narrows, and many of the steamers on this run are of over 20-foot draft and too large to pass through the Narrows, and are obliged to take the outside passage around Cape Decision, which means a loss of over 300 miles in making the round trip from Seattle to Juneau, with increased dangers of navigation in treacherous currents where many wrecks have occurred during the past 12 years. It is also to be noted that steamers on this run, going through Wrangell Narrows, are frequently detained for a high stage of tide or for daylight and thus lose a great deal of valuable time, and on account of the tortuous and rocky nature of this channel, which is 20 miles long, it can never be improved to accommodate ships of larger tonnage, and the insurance on vessels going through it will undoubtedly always remain very much higher than anywhere else in southeastern Alaskan waters.

Wrankell Narrows is the most difficult portion of the Inside Passage to southeastern Alaska. It is the only portion where vessels are delayed on account of insufficient depth of water at low tide. An examination and survey of Wrangell Narrows were made in 1902 and 1903, and the reports thereon are printed in House Document No. 39, Fifty-eighth Congress, second session, and in the report of Chief of Engineers for 1904, pages 3656 and 3661.

The distance via Dry Straits, along the route of approach now usually taken by vessels, would be about 10 miles shorter than the present route through Wrangell Narrows. The channel through Wrangell Narrows is lined in many places with rock ledges, and fairly strong currents exist.

On December 22, 1914, there was inserted in the river and harbor bill, H. R. 20189, a clause providing for a survey of Dry Straits. This survey was made in June and July, in the year 1916, under instructions of the United States Engineer's Office, at Seattle, and borings made. Without official information your memorialists do not believe that any rocks or obstacles in the formation were discovered that would be likely to prove a difficulty in the construction of the canal. The report, however, of the engineers, as to the project or its feasibility, has not yet been published.

The report of Capt. G. B. Pillsbury, captain, Corps of Engineers, under date of June 3, 1907, and contained in letter from Secretary of War, subject Dry Straits, Alaska, and being Document No. 556, Sixtieth Congress, first session, contains the commercial statistics for the calendar year 1907 and estimating the value of domestic merchandise shipped to southeastern Alaska ports, north of Dry Straits and Wrangell Narrows, at $2,978,771, and in reference to which he quotes: "The commerce of the Inside Passage is somewhat difficult to ascertain on account of the various destinations of the freight passing through it. It has been necessary to estimate certain of the items but it is believed that these estimates are conservative."

To show the increase of commerce of the Inside Passage since the year 1907 your memorialists would respectfully direct your attention to the following figures for the year 1916, as may be seen by consulting the customs reports for that year, reached through Dry Straits as follows:

Southwestern Alaska	9,283,730

Upon careful examination from customs reports it will be seen during the period under review, to wit: That the exports for all of Alaska for the calendar year 1907 amounted to the sum of $27,582,159, and that the exports for all of Alaska for the calendar year 1916 amounted to the sum of $79,051,758.

Your memorialists would further represent and direct your attention to the great importance of the Dry Straits proposition being given careful and serious consideration by the United States Government, especially so at this time when our Nation is in a state of war with foreign nations, for the reason that the present route used by transportation companies is only accessible for ships of certain tonnage and would be impossible for purposes of coast defense for ships of the Navy of the United States, and that if the proposed channel across Dry Straits be made it will be a matter of greater importance to this Nation to know that the largest ships of war could be moved through the Inside Passage via the proposed canal, which could never be done via Wrangell Narrows.

That a copy of this memorial be sent to the President of the United States, the President of the United States Senate, the Speaker of the United States House of Representatives, the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, and to the Delegate to Congress from Alaska.

Therefore, we, your memorialists, request and petition that steps be taken by the United States Government as early as possible for the dredging of Dry Straits.

And your memorialists will ever pray, etc.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. PENROSE. I introduce sundry bills for reference.

Mr. JONES of Washington. When bills of a general character are introduced I should like to have the titles read. I do not ask that the titles of private bills be read. I think they ought to be sent to the clerks at the desk and noted and the time of the Senate not taken up with them, but I should like to have the titles of general bills read.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. PENROSE:

A bill (S. 2278) to organize 10 or more regiments of Indian Cavalry as part of the military forces of the United States, to be known as the North American Indian Cavalry; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

A bill (S. 2279) to grant an allowance to rural mail carriers for maintenance of necessary equipment; to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

A bill (S. 2280) to reinstate Henry Read Leonard, jr., as an ensign in United States Navy; to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

A bill (S. 2281) granting a pension to Emma J. Corey; and

A bill (S. 2282) granting an increase of pension to Lyman F. Deming; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. CUMMINS:

A bill (S. 2284) granting an increase of pension to William A. Reeves (with accompanying papers); and

A bill (S. 2285) granting an increase of pension to Frederick Enneker (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. JONES of Washington:

A bill (S. 2286) granting an increase of pension to William Booth;

A bill (S. 2287) granting an increase of pension to William N. Webb (with accompanying papers); and

A bill (S. 2288) granting an increase of pension to Joseph W. Gay (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. JONES of New Mexico:

A bill (S. 2289) granting certain lands to the village of Hot Springs, N. Mex., and for other purposes;

A bill (S. 2290) for the relief of Alma Harris; and

A bill (S. 2291) creating the National Park of the Cliff Cities; to the Committee on Public Lands.

By Mr. GALLINGER:

A bill (S. 2292) granting an increase of pension to George Campbell (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. NEWLANDS:

A bill (S. 2293) to amend the act to regulate commerce as amended, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

LAND-SETTLEMENT AND HOMESTEAD COMMISSION.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I wish to introduce a bill, and I should like to have it inserted in the RECORD.

The bill (S. 2283) for a Federal land-settlement and homestead commission was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Whereas the last census shows that of the 20,000,000 families in the United States less than 6,000,000 owned their homes free from incumbrance, while nearly 11,000,000 families, representing over one-half our population, owned no homes at all; and

Whereas the passing of the home owner in the United States is being accompanied by a general desertion of the rural districts, a rapid decline in the number of our citizens engaged in agriculture, and the concentration of the people in the cities, where more than half of the inhabitants of the Republic are already gathered; and

Whereas such conditions are a steadily increasing menace to the existence, the happiness, and the efficiency of the Nation; and

Whereas the highest form of preparedness for war or peace lies in universal home ownership; and

Whereas nearly all the other leading Governments have adopted constructive land-purchase, and land-settlement policies in order to aid the people in acquiring and maintaining homes: Therefore

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of Agriculture, the Secretary of the Interior, and the Secretary of Labor are hereby constituted a commission to study the question of land settlement in the United States, to be known as the Federal land-settlement and homestead commission.

SEC. 2. That the said commission shall complete its labors and make final report to Congress within one year from date hereof.

SEC. 3. That the commission shall employ such expert and clerical assistance as it may deem necessary, utilizing present employees of the departments of the Government as far as practicable, the total amount expended by them for such assistance and for such incidental expenditures as it may consider essential, not to exceed $50,000, which amount is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

SEC. 4. That the members of the commission and its appointees, when traveling on the business of the commission, shall be paid from the funds herein appropriated actual living and transportation expenses to be certified to the Secretary of the Treasury on vouchers authorized and signed by the members of the commission.

SEC. 5. That the commission shall carry on an inquiry covering all parts of the country as to—

First. Methods and results of unregulated private settlement.

Second. Need for more favorable financial terms of purchase by tenants and others desiring to become home owners.

Third. Feasibility and value of adopting in this country some of the land-settlement and home-loan policies of other countries.

Fourth. Feasibility and value of cooperation between State and Federal authorities in aiding the people to acquire homes and for the creation of settlements in which community as well as individual needs are cared for.

Fifth. Methods of not only aiding an individual to acquire a home but also to establish himself permanently on the soil.

Sixth. Methods of regulating land speculation, absentee landlordism, of preventing concentration of land ownership in the few and kindred evils.

Seventh. Such other methods as the commission may find advisable to arrest the alarming growth of tenantry in the United States, the spread of landlordism, and the disappearance of the home-owning American, all of which threatens to reduce the American people to the condition of a people without lands and without homes.

RIVER AND HARBOR APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. NELSON submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the river and harbor appropriation bill (H. R. 4285), which was referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS—JOSHUA E. HOWARD.

On motion of Mr. JAMES, it was Ordered, That the papers accompanying the bill (S. 2573) granting a pension to Joshua E. Howard, Sixty-fourth Congress, first session, be withdrawn from the files of the Senate, no adverse report having been made thereon.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by J. C. South, its Chief Clerk, informed the Senate that the House of Representatives has recommitted to the committee of conference the report of the committee on the disagreeing votes of the two House on the amendment of the Senate to the bill

(H. R. 3545) to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States.

The message also announced that the House had passed the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 61) to grant authority for the erection of temporary buildings at the headquarters of the American Red Cross, Washington, D. C.

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled joint resolution (S. J. Res. 61) to grant authority for the erection of temporary buildings at the headquarters of the American Red Cross, Washington, D. C., and it was thereupon signed by the Vice President.

INCREASE OF MILITARY ESTABLISHMENT.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, in view of the fact that the House has recommitted the report on House bill 3545, the Military Establishment bill, to the conference committee, I desire to withdraw the report of the committee which I submitted yesterday informally and in order that it might be printed, so that the bill may go back to conference.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the conference report is withdrawn.

ARMY AND NAVY APPROPRIATIONS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 3971) making appropriations to supply urgent deficiencies in appropriations for the Military and Naval Establishments on account of war expenses for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917, and for other purposes, which had been reported from the Committee on Appropriations with amendments.

Mr. MARTIN. I should like to have my request put to the Senate that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Virginia asks unanimous consent that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with, that it be read for amendment, and that the committee amendments be first considered.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Would that exclude, when a particular topic is up, the presentation of an amendment from the floor? I am a little embarrassed on account of an amendment I wish to present by the question upon my mind as to whether it would be an amendment to the committee amendment and would have to come in connection with the committee amendments, or whether it should come afterwards. For that reason I hesitate to consent that the committee amendments shall be considered first.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Of course, the Chair has no means of knowing what the amendment of the Senator from Georgia is.

Mr. MARTIN. I have no idea. Of course, if the Senator objects we can not proceed along the line I have suggested.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I am very anxious not to object.

Mr. MARTIN. This practice has been universally followed, and it is the first time I have ever known an objection made to it.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. If the Senator had been here a few days ago he would have heard the objection made and he would have seen the other course taken. But I am so anxious to facilitate the work of the Senator that I do not make any objection. I shall take my chances.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If there be no objection, then, the bill will be read for action upon the amendments of the committee.

The Secretary proceeded to read the bill.

The first amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, beginning with line 1 on page 2, to insert:

COUNCIL OF NATIONAL DEFENSE.

For expenses of experimental work and investigations undertaken by the Council of National Defense, by the advisory commission or subordinate bodies, for the employment of a director, expert and clerical expenses, for rental of quarters in the District of Columbia and for the necessary supplies, and for the necessary expenses of members of the council, of the advisory commission, or subordinate bodies going to and attending meetings of the commission or subordinate bodies, $500,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, in addition to the appropriation for this purpose provided in the "Act making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918, and for other purposes": Provided, That of this original appropriation there shall be available during the current fiscal year for the rent of offices in the District of Columbia the sum of $20,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, in addition to the appropriation for rent of offices for the Council of National Defense in the District of Columbia made in the Army act above referred to.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do not think this portion of the amendment should be taken up by itself. There is an entire amendment from the committee which goes on through two more pages. It seems to me that the entire amendment ought to be acted upon, and not by piecemeal, especially as there are some amendments to be offered which would affect the entire provision.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I think the Senator from Georgia is mistaken. The pending amendment relating to a Council of National Defense has no connection whatever with the next two pages, which are in relation to the emergency shipping fund.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Then I will modify my suggestion, and, so far as the amendment applies to the Council of National Defense, I shall not object to separate action upon it. I shall only ask that the amendment relating to the emergency shipping fund be treated as a whole.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, this is extremely important legislation about which the Members of the Senate know nothing, as far as its details are concerned. We have not any report of the hearings which have been given; they have not been printed, and perhaps they ought not to be printed. I am not arguing that they should be printed; but I think in appropriating in one bill as much money as we expended for the entire conduct of the Civil War Senators are justified in having from the committee information about all the details of the legislation. I do not believe there is a Senator on the floor who has any desire to curtail the amount of money which the Government needs for the conduct of this war or who has any disposition to delay the action which the committee desires; but I do think we should have a pretty definite explanation made by the committee as to the details relating to this very extravagant amount of money.

If the committee thinks it undesirable to go into details in public, I believe the Senate should go into executive session. Speaking for myself, I am not prepared to vote yes or no on very many of the propositions contained in this bill without knowing something more than I do now about the manner of the expenditure, whether it is all necessary at this time, and many other things which may possibly require explanation, and which may require such explanation as the Senator in charge of the bill thinks it undesirable to make in public. I make this suggestion to him because it does not seem to me that we are justified in hurrying over legislation of this vast importance.

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. President, it is rather difficult to determine the line of demarcation between what ought to be considered behind closed doors and what might go to the public. For instance, in this matter I do not know that secrecy is necessary, but the Secretary of War appeared before the committee, and he made the request that it should not go to the public.

Mr. HARDWICK. If the Senator will pardon me, I really think it should be considered with closed doors.

Mr. MARTIN. I think Senators are entitled to full information. We had only 25 copies of the hearings printed, because many of the officers who appeared before us, and particularly the Secretary of War, requested that the hearings should be considered as confidential. If it will be of any service, I shall be very glad to pass a copy of the hearings to the Senator from Massachusetts, but he will not have time to examine them.

Mr. WEEKS. Speaking for myself, it seems to me that I should take three or four days to study this legislation. Perhaps the explanations which the Senator may be able to give would very much limit the time that I think ought to be taken; but I have not seen the hearings, and other Senators on the floor have not seen them. We know nothing about them.

Mr. MARTIN. I move that the doors be closed in order that the Senate may proceed to the consideration of legislative matters in secret session.

Mr. OVERMAN. I second the motion.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Sergeant at Arms will clear the galleries and close the doors.

Thereupon (at 12 o'clock and 20 minutes p. m.) the Senate proceeded to deliberate with closed doors. After 4 hours and 50 minutes the doors were reopened.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I am one of those who favored returning to open legislative session because in connection with the pending amendment there was something I desired to say.

The amendment refers to the Council for National Defense, and is merely an appropriation for their service. The Council for National Defense exists by statute and has certain statutory limitations as to what it shall do, to which apparently slight attention is paid, and to which apparently it is intended to pay still less attention in the future; but so far as this clause goes it is merely an appropriation. I hope that we shall add the amendment of the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING], which merely suggests that the law should not be violated by the council.

What I desired to say in this connection was of a general character. I have been watching, Mr. President, the demands in the newspapers for prompt action on the part of Congress, and I have observed the frequency with which we have been called slackers, and that an earnest effort has been made to impress on the public mind that we were doing nothing here.

Mr. President, it is just six weeks to-day, I believe, since war was declared. Let me speak first of my personal experience. I think my own case does not differ from that of any other Senator here. I have worked hard all my life, and I think I know what hard work is.

I have never worked so hard or so much as I have since that declaration of war, and that I think is true of everyone in both branches.

It is said by certain newspapers that we have done nothing. Let us see. The declaration of war was on the 4th of April. Since that time, as a beginning, we passed four great appropriation bills which came over from the last Congress. We then passed a great loan bill carrying five billions in bonds and two billions in Treasury notes. We have passed through both Houses a bill for selective conscription. It is in its very last stage of conference at this moment. It will be a law in a day or two. England and Canada have been discussing conscription under the pressure of war for nearly three years. Neither of them has passed conscription yet. We have done it in both Houses inside of a fortnight.

Is it to be supposed that a complete revolution not only in the traditions of the country but in the traditions of our race, of the people who speak the English language, was to be effected in a morning? It is something on which there was a great, a natural, division of opinion, and it was right to discuss selective conscription and also whether men over conscriptive age could be permitted to offer their lives to their country.

We have passed through both Houses, and it has become law, the bill to take the German ships. We have passed a number of important bills for the Navy, including the bill passed yesterday which increases the seamen to 150,000 and the marines to 30,000. We have passed the spy bill through both Houses. It is now in conference and it will be disposed of finally and become a law very shortly.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Will it interrupt the Senator to yield to me for a moment? I wish to call attention to the fact in connection with the spy bill that we devoted more time on that bill to striking from it a provision for news censorship that would satisfy the Department of Justice than to other portions of the bill, and I think even the newspapers will agree with us that it was time well spent.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, what the Senator from Georgia says is quite true. The spy bill included 12 separate bills, and where was reason for the great debate? It was caused by the nature of the bill sent down by the administration. The delay grew out of provisions, as the Senator from Georgia has pointed out, which were brought to us here from outside. Yet the cry goes out that we are responsible for the delay.

Mr. FALL. Will it interrupt the Senator——

Mr. LODGE. Not at all.

Mr. FALL. To remind him that aside from the censorship proposition the debate which required the most time was one on which we had absolutely no information from the administration until we had acted, and then later we received information from the administration which might have been imparted in the first place, and which caused us debate as to whether we should reverse our former action.

Mr. LODGE. That is quite true, as all Senators know; it was the chapter relating to exports.

Now, Mr. President, with that list which I have given, and I have given the principal ones which we have dealt with, I say deliberately and after a somewhat extended experience in public life that it shows a remarkable amount of work done. We have also before us to-day this great appropriation bill, which has passed one House. The unfinished business yesterday the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] called up was the food bill.

Now, take that whole record; I say it shows unusual and extraordinary work on the part of Congress.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I think the Senator should also add to the statement which he is now making that the members of the Committee on Finance, practically all of them, except the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. HUGHES], who is ill, have been giving a great part of the time, both when the Senate is in session and not in session, in hearings and investigations of the revenue bill, the largest revenue bill that Congress has ever been called upon to consider.

Mr. LODGE. Yes, Mr. President; those hearings have been going on all the week, calling on the members of the committee for attendance. We have also had work to do on the Naval Committee, and then there is the great work that was done in the Military Affairs Committee, and also in the Agricultural Committee. All this was being done apart from what occurs in this Chamber. I now yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I simply want to suggest to the Senator from Massachusetts that he has overlooked the fact that the Senate, at least, has in very important particulars amended the banking and currency act, passing in a brief time a bill that ordinarily would have taken a week's discussion. That is one of the bills to which the Senator from Massachusetts did not call attention.

Mr. LODGE. No; I did not mention that; I had forgotten it. We have passed a number of other bills——

Mr. REED. Yes; there are others.

Mr. LODGE. And we have passed them by unanimous consent, bills which under ordinary circumstances would have taken time for their discussion. I repeat, Mr. President, that is an extraordinary record of hard, active, energetic work.

There seems to be an idea abroad that the sole business of Congress is to take a bill which is sent down from some bureau, which has been drafted perhaps by some excellent gentleman who emerged upon the public gaze within the last few months, and that our business is to sit here, have his bill read, and then pass it, with a few commendatory and grateful observations, in the course of the morning hour. I do not know how far what I am saying may reach, but it is just as well, Mr. President, that it should be understood by the press, at least, that this is not the conception of the duties of Congress which I and other Senators and Representatives who feel their responsibility entertain. We are not here to swallow all legislation presented to us from a department and not even look at it. We should be recreant to the people who have elected us if we did not use our utmost efforts to secure the best legislation possible and as rapidly as we can in this great crisis of the country's fate.

Mr. President, under the pressure of war we are having demands made upon us for powers to be invested nominally in the President, but really in Cabinet officers, the heads of bureaus, and in commissions—creatures of the moment—which equal the powers exercised by the great autocracy of Germany. I do not think it is going too far to say that such grants of power ought to be very carefully considered.

We shall not expedite the war by destroying the legislative powers of this Government. We are in danger under this pressure for great haste of losing the confidence of the country, not only confidence in Congress but in both the administration and Congress.

The most important thing for carrying on the war is to keep the industries of the country in the field and farm and factory in the highest state of productivity possible. Such an atmosphere of uncertainty has been created by this demand for powers to interfere with every form of human activity, to be placed in the hands of men of whom the country knows absolutely nothing, that business is absolutely hesitating, is stopping, is languishing. Business and industry can sustain almost anything except suspense and threats hanging over their heads. But at this moment, as I have said, they are languishing.

You must have that spirit of confidence, you must make your farmers, your workingmen, and your business men understand that there is a reasonable certainty in the future that they are not going to be interfered with needlessly and recklessly. If you do not do it, if you allow the present condition of fear to continue, you will find your loans in danger and your sources of taxation drying up.

Therefore, Mr. President, it is more than ever important that these questions should be discussed here; that there should be reasonable and proper discussion. There has not been one instant of needless delay since the 4th of April, to my knowledge. The debate has been all genuine debate. We all want to pass the bills as rapidly as possible, but Congress is not going to be stampeded into passing bills of vast moment not merely from the money point of view but in the constitutional point of view by a demand for powers, because somebody who got control of a bureau or of a commission a little while ago thinks that unless he has unlimited power the country is in danger. The gentlemen who feel in that way have not yet adjusted their relation to the universe.

Mr. President, I earnestly hope that all this legislation will be disposed of as rapidly as possible, as rapidly as we have been acting here up to this moment; but nothing is to be gained by this parrot, echoed cry that Representatives and Senators are "slackers" because they are trying to fulfill the duties which have been placed upon them. We are not to be stampeded, and we ought not to be. Everyone of us would deserve to be removed from our seats if we gave without thought, without care, all these vast powers which we are asked to give; if we passed bills carrying these gigantic appropriations without even a look at them; if we run through a tax bill which proposes to take from the people annually $1,800,000,000 and not proceed to examine what the effect of those taxes will be. To suppose that such things can be done in an afternoon is a great mistake; and I trust it is an idea that will soon be dismissed from the public mind.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, what the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] has said reminds me of another phase of the conduct of the war. One would get the impression from the outcries for legislation that a war can be won by legislating. There never was anything more fallacious. We might enact bills in the way that the Senator from Massachusetts has described, without reading them, at the behest of the administration, from morning until night, week days and Sundays, and yet not advance a foot in the progress toward victory in this war upon which we have launched the Nation.

I do not want to be unduly critical of those who are responsible for the execution of the laws of Congress. I know that I have felt some resentment from time to time at what I have read in the news dispatches from Europe at the bickerings and the captiousness of some members of the legislative bodies of the allies in Europe, and I do not want to fall into the error in which it seems to me they have fallen. Yet pointing out what will be perfectly obvious to everybody when attention is called to it may have a wholesome effect occasionally, especially in view of the disposition, which there seems to be, to create the impression that the entire responsibility is on Congress and that the success or failure of the policy to which our people are committed depends solely upon this branch of the Government.

What is it that the administration wants? Power? What powers do they lack at the present stage of this war, and what use have they made of the powers which, almost in an unparalleled degree, have been conferred upon them? It is now almost three months since the President of the United States declared—and I think that he performed a public duty in making that declaration—that the interests of the citizens of the United States, the integrity of the Nation, the protection of our rights demanded war upon the German submarine.

Now, does the President lack any legislative authority to carry on that war? Does he lack any of the material means which Congress has within its power to grant to carry it on? Yet, although almost a quarter of a year has passed by, I have yet to hear of a single German submarine which has been sunk by the Navy of the United States. Is Congress responsible for that? If we are going to compare the merits or demerits of the different branches of the Government, if Congress is to make an accounting for not passing the necessary legislation, let the executive branch of the Government account for the performance of its duties in the exercise of the power which it has. So far as I have been able to see, since the President announced the policy which received the sanction of Congress, there has been an increase of destruction wrought by the German submarines instead of any lessening of it. Where is the Navy of the United States, so far as this duty is concerned, and what is it doing? Let them render an accounting if we are going to be called to account.

There is another thing to which I desire to refer. So far as power to conduct the war is concerned, not having sunk any German submarines nor captured them, we propose to meet that menace by supplying with others the place of the ships which are sunk by German submarines. The United States, having gone into the war, will render its great service to the allies by supplying tonnage to take the place of that which has been sent to the bottom of the sea by the submarines which we have been unable to control. Congress has met its part of that responsibility. It created the Shipping Board. It has given them great powers. I have not heard anybody contend that the Government has not sufficient power under the act of Congress creating the Shipping Board to carry out its policy in the building of ships to carry food to our allies. We have all read about the plans to meet the menace in that way. We have read and read and reread from day to day of what the Government was going to do; that it was going to build wooden ships. We have heard it iterated and reiterated, ad nauseam almost.

I come from a section of the country which is able to build wooden ships. One of the great industries of the great State of Washington is the production of the material of which these ships would be built. We have the men there to build them. We have great firms that in all the competition and stress of industrial activity have built up great businesses and been able to maintain themselves in the struggle for success, where wit is matched against wit and the capacity for performance is matched against a similar capacity. They have thronged the doors of the Shipping Board, asking to be permitted to aid the Government on such terms as the Government might fix, even though without profit, because, notwithstanding the opinion of some, there burns in the breasts even of the successful men of business a patriotic desire to serve their country. Months and months have gone by; they have been put off for weeks and weeks, looked upon with suspicion, as though they were seeking some selfish advantage, "trying to put something over on the Government," to use a slang phrase. The result of it has been that, although Congress has done its duty, has appropriated ample money and given almost unlimited authority, the executive branch of the Government has yet to let a contract for a single wooden ship, at least so far as the Pacific coast is concerned. They are not able yet, unless it is within the last three or four days, to tell what kind of wooden ships they want. Is Congress at fault for that? I do not think so, and the country does not think so.

I might go on and multiply instances, not, as I have already said, in any spirit of hostile criticism, but in order to point out to Congress and to the country that which should need pointing out, that the conduct of the war is in the hands of the executive branch of the Government, and that there is not only the duty of Congress to grant supplies and authority but the duty of the Executive to make timely and efficient use of the great trust.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, the statement made by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] just now is most timely and appropriate. It is well that the country's attention should be riveted, for a moment at least, to the amount of business which has been actually transacted by Congress since this special session was called. A moment's reflection upon the list of legislation which we have accomplished will, I think, indicate that, if there has been any fault, it has been in not giving sufficient consideration to it, because many of these acts of legislation are of transcendent importance, going far beyond in some respects anything that the American Congresses have been called upon to enact heretofore. We have other bills before us, of which the one now pending is a good illustration, carrying enormous amounts of money, providing for the use of this money in ways of emergency; and the people will hold us and ought to hold us responsible for a careful consideration of the things for which this money is intended, and for making due provision as to how it shall be expended.

But my purpose in rising, Mr. President, was to express some dissent from the evident conclusion of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] that the depressions in business to which he referred are caused by our consideration of the delegation of powers in different directions which may affect business. I think that has little to do with the depression which evidently exists in some sections of the country. That, I believe, can be attributed to the natural reaction which always sets in after a declaration of war. War, when first announced, is almost always followed by business reaction, by business depression, and by business discouragement. Then comes the reflex action, and business becomes better, perhaps, than in times of peace. I do not know of a single instance in modern times in which declarations of war have not been followed by these depressions and discouragements. Then, when the Government gets into the market for supplies, the stimulus which is given to business is immediately felt, and, although at terrible cost, the conditions of the country are generally prosperous.

I believe that just as soon as the Government does get into the market—and I am not disposed to criticize it on the ground of being dilatory, because it takes time to frame plans, specifications, and methods of procedure, not only for ship construction but in general—just as soon as the Government gets to utilizing its financial power in the equipment of the Army and the Navy, and that will be very soon, business will react to it, and these possibilities of disaster in business circles and along commercial lines will, I think, entirely disappear.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, I shall occupy only a few moments of the time while I give a few reasons why I shall not vote for this appropriation.

Under the law by which the Council of National Defense was created, as expounded and explained and reported upon by the Secretary of War, and I believe by the chairman, in his annual report, the purpose was, he says, as follows:

> The act provides for reports to be made from the council to the President, and from the President to Congress, so that a great body of valuable and helpful information will undoubtedly result.

Mr. President, I have no doubt that such reports to Congress would be, as Congress intended they should be, of very material aid and benefit in the deliberations of this body in enacting such legislation as we are continually called upon to enact by the executive departments of the Government. I have no doubt that if one of the prime purposes for which this board was created were performed by the board, the debate that took place here this morning behind closed doors and that is now taking place in open session could have been obviated. The time need not have been taken up, possibly, if we had had any report showing what this board have been doing and what they propose to do with the large additional amount of money which they ask us now to contribute from the Public Treasury for the continuance of their efforts.

I want to say that I have no doubt, from what information I have been able to gather from outside, piecemeal, here and there, and from the experience of other Senators, as detailed during this debate, that the advisory portion of this board has done very beneficial work. I think I can say, knowingly, that they have collected an enormous amount of very valuable information—information which I think this body should have in its possession in legislating upon appropriation bills and upon other bills granting power. But, unfortunately, the President of the United States has not seen fit to give to the Congress of the United States that information. Unfortunately, the Secretary of War—who doubtless has the reports of this board in his possession—has not seen fit to send them to this body. Therefore we are simply asked blindly to appropriate for continuing the work of a board whose duty it is to make its reports for the information of Congress. We are asked to appropriate a large amount of money without being informed in any respect officially as to what the board is doing.

I am inclined to think that I would not only agree, if we had the report, to appropriate any necessary amount but that for one I would be inclined to vest the advisory portion of this Council of National Defense with some powers which they, in certain instances, have been exercising without any authority of law.

Mr. President, upon the general subject of information to the legislative department of the Government, I for one do not care to legislate, to vote for or against any measure unless I am informed upon it. I have no pride of opinion. It is a matter of absolute indifference to me whether the proposed bill comes here from the War Department, from the Agricultural Department, from the Attorney General, or from any other department of the Government. I propose to consider it exactly as I would if it originated with any Member of this body or with a committee appointed by this body for the purpose of drafting such a proposed bill. I have no prejudices for or against the legislation which we are being continually requested now to enact because it originates with one or another of the executive departments; but I do demand that I shall be treated not as a rubber stamp but as an intelligent human being with certain constitutional duties to perform under an oath which I have taken in becoming a Member of this body. That is the only demand which I make; and in view of the fact that this board has not performed its duties in informing me intelligently, so that as an ordinarily intelligent human being I can act knowingly, I shall vote against spending the people's money any further along this line.

Mr. President, just think of it! We learn from the papers of the United States that we have a commission from Great Britain, and one from France, and one from Italy, whose business it is in this country largely to inform the people of the United States so that we may avoid the mistakes which Great Britain and France and other countries committed at the outbreak of this great war; that we may profit by their example; that we may, as I say, avoid the very costly mistakes which they made, which cost the people of those countries millions of dollars. We are told that this is the purpose of the commissions here. I defy any Member of this body to say that he has any official information upon that subject, unless it has been imparted to him through some member of the executive branch of the Government. In other words, there has been no report of any kind or character, as a preliminary for our action, given us along with a bill which we are requested to swallow whole; there has been no report as to any information obtained from these visiting statesmen which would guide us in our action or which would enable us, possibly, to avoid mistakes which they themselves have made. In the first place, if we knew exactly what the conditions have been in Great Britain and in France leading up to the commission of mistakes by their legislative bodies, we would then necessarily have to compare the conditions existing in this country with the conditions existing there at that time before we could formulate the necessary legislation to avoid such mistakes.

The difficulty is, Mr. President, that the executive departments assume either that we have all the knowledge that they may possess after months of study, or else that it is not necessary for them to impart to us any information, but merely to dictate a command. That is the difficulty. In my judgment, the Congress of the United States, if it did its duty now, by itself and by the people of this country, would immediately appoint a legislative committee to go to England and to go to France and investigate conditions on the ground and report to this body. That is the only way you will ever get any report, because you are ignored by the executive departments of your Government.

If you will discharge the responsibility that the people have placed upon you in electing you Members of the legislative branch of this Government, if you want to inform yourselves, you will take some method immediately to do it. I do not understand how we can be expected to avoid the mistakes with reference to food control or the regulation of prices which may have been made by acts or omissions to act in Great Britain unless we have some information upon which to base action here, by comparing the conditions existing in the United States with those existing at the time the mistake was made in Great Britain or in France. But aside from that we have no information whatsoever upon which we can base any guess or any judgment as to what we shall do relative to any particular thing which is sent here under the wing or under the seal of the executive departments, with simply a demand that we 96 gentlemen place our signature, by the use of a rubber stamp, upon it.

If I have information upon which I can intelligently act, I shall proceed to act without any prejudice or any bias or any partisanship; and I shall, to the very best of my ability, so long as I remain here, and certainly during this emergency, support the executive branch of this Government; but I demand information and the treatment due to a fairly intelligent Member of a coordinate branch of this Government. I will not vote for this proposition to appropriate one dollar until this board discharges its legal duty to this body and tells us what it has been doing. Then we can know whether or not we desire to continue its operations.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, it seems to me that the criticism made by the Senator from New Mexico is not well taken. We know that the annual reports that are made by all of the Cabinet officers and the heads of the bureaus under those departments are made in November in order to meet the demands of Congress for the regular session of Congress. This war has come upon us suddenly. The Shipping Board has been busy every minute and every hour of the time between the declaration of war and the present time; and if the Senator will read the confidential evidence that was taken he will find some things that have been done by this board.

Mr. President, I have no sympathy with those who have criticized this body or the other House of Congress for being negligent of their work. I know, and every Senator knows, that there has never before been as much diligent and faithful work performed in six weeks as has been performed by these two Houses since the declaration of war. But, Mr. President, I deplore reference by any Member of this body, in justification of our position, to any supposed negligence upon the part of the executive officers of the Government. If you investigate what they are doing, the enormous work they have to perform, the great number of men that have to be raised, the great problems that have been presented and which must be solved and recommendations made by them, you will find that they have not been sleeping upon their jobs. They have been busy every minute of the days since the declaration of war.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. PENROSE. I am not informed that anyone, up to the present time, has been criticizing the executive departments for delay.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I think there has been some little reference to it, though not very pointed; but there has been a reference to the fact of things not being done, and not being ready. I do not know that the Senator has been here during all the discussion, but I think there was some reference to it.

Mr. PENROSE. I have been here all day, and I do not recall any criticism in the nature of a charge of delay. There has been a suggestion of incompetence, or an excess of legal power, perhaps working overtime instead of delay. That is very different, however, from a charge of delay. There has been strong insinuation of inefficiency and incompetence and the assumption of powers that were never contemplated in order to coerce the business of the country.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I thought that the remarks of the Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER] somewhat reflected upon not only the ability but the diligence of the various departments, or of some departments, and I was sorry to hear a reference of that kind. But, outside of that, it seems to me——

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

Mr. SHAFROTH. I yield to the Senator from Washington.

Mr. POINDEXTER. The Senator from Colorado does not dispute any of the facts that I stated, does he?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I think the reference which the Senator made to some of the departments is subject to dispute. I think they are diligent. I think they have been working day and night upon their matters, and that they are as earnest in their desire to get matters in shape for the conduct of this war as any Member of this body.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I agree with the Senator in that; at least, we will assume that to be the case. I did not intend to say—and repudiate the suggestion—that any important officer of the executive departments of the Government was not doing the best that he could or that he was not loyal and patriotic.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I am glad the Senator has made that statement, and I am sorry that I got a different impression from what he was saying.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I want to repeat, though, and point out what I did say, that they have failed to accomplish results, and results are what we are looking for. There has been no damage done to German submarines, for instance. I think there ought to have been, myself, in this length of time since we started to make war on them; and Congress is not going to do that. You can not run a war with a debating society. You have got to have an executive to do that. The Senator from Colorado can frame his own adjectives and make such characterization of it as he feels fit. I am simply pointing to the situation.

The Senator from Colorado can not claim that, with all of the authority we have conferred, we have built or started to build any wooden ships. Now, I say that we have had time enough to begin building wooden ships, and that there have been facilities offered to the Shipping Board by which they could have begun a long time ago to build wooden ships, and could have been fairly on the way toward the construction of tonnage to meet the submarine destruction which they have failed to meet in any other way.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. If the Senator from Colorado will allow me a moment, I think the Senator from Washington has overlooked in his statement that our Government has not done anything with reference to the U boats the news the afternoon paper contains. It says:

United States destroyers now fighting U boats with allied warships in the North Sea—Flotilla flying United States flag active in hostile waters.

So it does appear that our boats are beginning to get into action.

Mr. POINDEXTER. That is the first news I have heard. It is quite refreshing. I am glad to hear it.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, of course we are not familiar with the movements of the ships of our Navy, and we ought not to be so informed. What I dislike is a criticism of that kind when the Senator can not possibly be informed with relation to the question. The movement of the Navy is something that must be kept secret, and therefore it is not known to the Members of this body. Consequently, to say that the Navy Department is doing nothing, I think, is an injustice and that which we should not indulge in. It brings a conflict between the executive branch of the Government and the legislative branch, which is not wise.

England has been trying to cope with the submarine boats for a number of years and has not been able to do it except to a limited extent. It can not be possible when we have been at war only six weeks that we should have mastered the situation. So nobody should be criticized for not doing it. All these are problems that take time. They must be studied. On the proposition which the Senator refers to concerning wooden ships the experts differ. Gen. Goethels says in his judgment they should be steel ships. As a matter of fact, they have found out by an examination of the cost that there is very little difference between the cost of wooden ships and steel ships, it being $135 a ton for wooden and $153 for steel ships.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

Mr. SHAFROTH. In just a moment. The bid that has been made concerning steel ships discloses that one company will undertake the construction of those steel ships under a standardization plan and get them out at the rate of one a day after a period of six months' preparation. With that statement it seems to me that the policy for wooden ships should be reversed, if it were ever undertaken. I yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. REED. In the interest of accuracy and because there have been a number of statements made in the Senate which I believe are erroneous, I think I ought to state, at least, my understanding of the situation. A proposition was entertained to build a large number of wooden ships. It was believed they could be obtained much more rapidly than steel vessels. But afterwards a proposition was submitted to furnish steel vessels with unexpected rapidity, and after consultation it was concluded to accept both propositions. There is no real conflict anywhere, but it is agreed, even conceding that steel ships may be superior to wooden ships, nevertheless it is advisable at this time to build vessels of both kinds. I think that is the fact and that there is no conflict between the board and any other high official.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I think the policy is now to build at least some wooden ships, but I believe the intention is to build a greater number of steel ships.

Mr. President, we ought to take a vote on this proposition. Five hundred thousand dollars is a very small sum to put into the hands of a board that is going to investigate so many of the different activities of the United States. On that account, it seems to me, we should adopt the amendment which is before the Senate at the present time.

Mr. STERLING. I now offer the following amendment to the committee amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. Add at the end of the committee amendment the following:

In the expenditure of said moneys the existence of a state of war shall not be construed as enlarging the powers or duties of the Council of National Defense, but that such powers and duties shall remain as prescribed by the act creating said council, approved August 29, 1916.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I am not sure whether that changes the law; but if it has any effect at all, it is a change of existing law, and as this item is not a change of law, but merely an appropriation item, I make the point of order that the amendment is legislation on an appropriation bill.

Mr. LODGE. It is a declaration of existing law, and the rule is only as to a change of existing law in this body.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. If it is merely a declaration of existing law, then it accomplishes nothing.

Mr. LODGE. Then there is no possible harm in putting it on the bill. There is no possible harm in saying to those eminent gentlemen we hope they will observe the law, because that is all it amounts to. But the moment it is suggested that they should be kept within the law resistance arises.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. There is no resistance on my part, Mr. President. As to these gentlemen keeping within the law, I do not think that on every appropriation bill and in every item for money to be expended it is necessary to state that we expect the officials of the Government who have the matter in charge to keep within the law. I think that assumption can be indulged in until it is proved to the contrary. But if the Chair holds that this is simply a declaration of existing law, then, of course, the point of order will not be good, and the amendment will mean nothing. If it is an amendment of existing law, I think it should be made at the proper time and in the proper way before the proper committee. Therefore I insist on the point of order and ask the Chair to rule.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There are two questions, and one the Chair would be in doubt about if it were necessary to pass upon it—that is, as to whether this is a general appropriation bill or not, within the meaning of the rules of the Senate. The Chair does not choose to pass on that proposition. The present occupant has ruled a number of times that it was not changing existing law nor was it general legislation to provide in a general appropriation bill how the money shall be used or how it shall not be used. So, as the amendment simply provides that in the expenditure of said money it shall not be used to violate the present statute, the Chair thinks it is in order and overrules the point of order.

The question is on the amendment of the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING] to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. MARTIN. I move that the Senate adjourn until 11 o'clock to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 10 minutes p. m., Wednesday, May 16, 1917) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, May 17, 1917, at 11 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, May 16, 1917.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

We thank Thee, our Father in Heaven, for the good, the true, the noble, the pure, the God-like; and we pray that their tribe may increase until all mankind shall come unto the measure of the stature of the fulness of Christ; that sin and iniquity may be banished from the earth, and peace, joy, and righteousness possess the minds and hearts of all men, to the glory and honor of Thy Holy Name. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Waldorf, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had passed with amendments the bill (H. R. 3330) to temporarily increase the commissioned and warrant and enlisted strength of the Navy and Marine Corps, and for other purposes, had insisted upon its amendments, had asked for a conference with the House of Representatives on the amendments, and had appointed Mr. SWANSON, Mr. SMITH of Maryland, and Mr. LODGE as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed the bill (S. 1811) providing for the counting of service in the Army or Navy of the United States as equivalent to residence and cultivation upon homestead entries, and in the event of the soldier's death in such service providing for the issuance of patent for such land to his widow or minor children, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment the bill (H. R. 2337) to amend an act entitled "An act making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917, and for other purposes," relative to enrollments in the Naval Reserve Force.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. POLK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by having printed therein a communication received from a committee appointed by the citizens of Sussex County, Del., relative to farm labor and the supply of fertilizer; also a communication relating to farm labor; also resolutions of Peach Blossom Grange, of Middletown, Del., relating to the control of food prices.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Delaware asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD in the manner indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

RESIGNATION OF A MEMBER.

The SPEAKER. The Chair lays before the House the resignation of a Member, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

COMMITTEE ON WAYS AND MEANS,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., May 15, 1917.

MY DEAR SIR: Having been ordered on active duty as a reserve officer of the United States Army, I have the honor to state that I have this day transmitted to the governor of Massachusetts my resignation as a Representative in Congress.

Very respectfully, A. P. GARDNER.

Hon. CHAMP CLARK,
Speaker of the House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

INCREASE OF THE MILITARY ESTABLISHMENT.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report on the bill (H. R. 3545) to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States. In view of the fact that this report is substantially the same as that submitted a few days ago, with the exception of the incorporation of what is known as the Roosevelt amendment, I ask unanimous consent that the statement be read in lieu of the report.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama calls up a conference report and asks unanimous consent that the statement be read in lieu of the report. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the statement.

The conference report and statement are as follows:

CONFERENCE REPORT (NO. 52).

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 3545) to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States, having met, after full and further conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment insert the following:

"That in view of the existing emergency, which demands the raising of troops in addition to those now available, the President be, and he is hereby, authorized—

"First. Immediately to raise, organize, officer, and equip all or such number of increments of the Regular Army provided by the national defense act approved June 3, 1916, or such parts thereof as he may deem necessary; to raise all organizations of the Regular Army, including those added by such increments, to the maximum enlisted strength authorized by law. Vacancies in the Regular Army created or caused by the addition of increments as herein authorized which can not be filled by promotion may be filled by temporary appointment for the period of the emergency or until replaced by permanent appointments or by provisional appointments made under the provisions of section 23 of the national defense act, approved June 3, 1916, and hereafter provisional appointments under said section may be terminated whenever it is determined, in the manner prescribed by the President, that the officer has not the suitability and fitness requisite for permanent appointment.

"Second. To draft into the military service of the United States, organize, and officer, in accordance with the provisions of section 111 of said national defense act, so far as the provisions of said section may be applicable and not inconsistent with the terms of this act, any or all members of the National Guard and of the National Guard Reserves, and said members so drafted into the military service of the United States shall serve therein for the period of the existing emergency unless sooner discharged: Provided, That when so drafted the organizations or units of the National Guard shall, so far as practicable, retain the State designations of their respective organizations.

"Third. To raise by draft as herein provided, organize and equip an additional force of 500,000 enlisted men, or such part or parts thereof as he may at any time deem necessary, and to provide the necessary officers, line and staff, for said force and for organizations of the other forces hereby authorized, or by combining organizations of said other forces, by ordering members of the Officers' Reserve Corps to temporary duty in accordance with the provisions of section 38 of the national defense act approved June 3, 1916; by appointment from the Regular Army, the Officers' Reserve Corps, from those duly qualified and registered pursuant to section 23 of the act of Congress approved January 21, 1903 (32 Stat. L., 775), from the members of the National Guard drafted into the service of the United States, from those who have been graduated from educational institutions at which military instruction is compulsory, or from those who have had honorable service in the Regular Army, the National Guard, or in the volunteer forces, or from the country at large; by assigning retired officers of the Regular Army to active duty with such force with their rank on the retired list and the full pay and allowances of their grade; or by the appointment of retired officers and enlisted men, active or retired, of the Regular Army as commissioned officers in such forces: Provided, That the organization of said force shall be the same as that of the corresponding organizations of the Regular Army: Provided further, That the President is authorized to increase or decrease the number of organizations prescribed for the typical brigades, divisions, or army corps of the Regular Army, and to prescribe such new and different organizations and personnel for army corps, divisions, brigades, regiments, battalions, squadrons, companies, troops, and batteries as the efficiency of the service may require: Provided further, That the number of organizations in a regiment shall not be increased nor shall the number of regiments be decreased: Provided further, That the President in his discretion may organize, officer, and equip for each Infantry and Cavalry brigade three machine-gun companies, and for each Infantry and Cavalry division four machine-gun companies, all in addition to the machine-gun companies comprised in organizations included in such brigades and divisions: Provided further, That the President in his discretion may organize for each division one armored motor car machine-gun company. The machine-gun companies organized under this section shall consist of such commissioned and enlisted personnel and be equipped in such manner as the President may prescribe: And provided further, That officers with rank not above that of colonel shall be appointed by the President alone, and officers above that grade by the President by and with the advice and consent of the Senate: Provided further, That the President may in his discretion, recommission in the Coast Guard persons who have heretofore held commissions in the Revenue-Cutter Service or the Coast Guard and have left the service honorably, after ascertaining that they are qualified for service physically, morally, and as to age and military fitness.

"Fourth. The President is further authorized, in his discretion and at such time as he may determine, to raise and begin the training of an additional force of 500,000 men organized, officered, and equipped, as provided for the force first mentioned in the preceding paragraph of this section.

"Fifth. To raise by draft, organize, equip, and officer, as provided in the third paragraph of this section, in addition to and for each of the above forces, such recruit training units as he may deem necessary for the maintenance of such forces at the maximum strength.

"Sixth. To raise, organize, officer, and maintain during the emergency such number of ammunition batteries and battalions, depot batteries and battalions, and such artillery parks, with such numbers and grades of personnel as he may deem necessary. Such organizations shall be officered in the manner provided in the third paragraph of this section, and enlisted men may be assigned to said organizations from any of the forces herein provided for or raised by selective draft as by this act provided.

"Seventh. The President is further authorized to raise and maintain by voluntary enlistment, to organize, and equip, not to exceed four infantry divisions, the officers of which shall be selected in the manner provided by paragraph 3 of section 1 of this act: Provided, That the organization of said force shall be the same as that of the corresponding organization of the Regular Army: And provided further, That there shall be no enlistments in said force of men under 25 years of age at time of enlisting: And provided further, That no such volunteer force shall be accepted in any unit smaller than a division.

"SEC. 2. That the enlisted men required to raise and maintain the organizations of the Regular Army and to complete and maintain the organizations embodying the members of the National Guard drafted into the service of the United States, at the maximum legal strength as by this act provided, shall be raised by voluntary enlistment, or if and whenever the President decides that they can not effectually be so raised or maintained, then by selective draft; and all other forces hereby authorized, except as provided in the seventh paragraph of section 1, shall be raised and maintained by selective draft exclusively; but this provision shall not prevent the transfer to any force of training cadres from other forces. Such draft as herein provided shall be based upon liability to military service of all male citizens, or male persons not alien enemies who have declared their intention to become citizens, between the ages of 21 and 30 years, both inclusive, and shall take place and be maintained under such regulations as the President may prescribe not inconsistent with the terms of this act. Quotas for the several States, Territories, and the District of Columbia, or subdivisions thereof, shall be determined in proportion to the population thereof, and credit shall be given to any State, Territory, District, or subdivision thereof, for the number of men who were in the military service of the United States as members of the National Guard on April 1, 1917, or who have since said date entered the military service of the United States from any such State, Territory, District, or subdivision, either as members of the Regular Army or the National Guard. All persons drafted into the service of the United States and all officers accepting commissions in the forces herein provided for shall, from the date of said draft or acceptance, be subject to the laws and regulations governing the Regular Army, except as to promotions, so far as such laws and regulations are applicable to persons whose permanent retention in the military service on the active or retired list is not contemplated by existing law, and those drafted shall be required to serve for the period of the existing emergency unless sooner discharged: Provided, That the President is authorized to raise and maintain by voluntary enlistment or draft, as herein provided, special and technical troops as he may deem necessary, and to embody them into organizations and to officer them as provided in the third paragraph of section 1 and section 9 of this act. Organizations of the forces herein provided for, except the Regular Army and the divisions authorized in the seventh paragraph of section 1, shall, as far as the interests of the service permit, be composed of men who come, and of officers who are appointed from, the same State or locality.

"SEC. 3. No bounty shall be paid to induce any person to enlist in the military service of the United States; and no person liable to military service shall hereafter be permitted or allowed to furnish a substitute for such service; nor shall any substitute be received, enlisted, or enrolled in the military service of the United States; and no such person shall be permitted to escape such service or to be discharged therefrom prior to the expiration of his term of service by the payment of money or any other valuable thing whatsoever as consideration for his release from military service or liability thereto.

"SEC. 4. That the Vice President of the United States, the officers, legislative, executive, and judicial of the United States and of the several States, Territories, and the District of Columbia, regular or duly ordained ministers of religion, students who at the time of the approval of this act are preparing for the ministry in recognized theological or divinity schools, and all persons in the military and naval service of the United States shall be exempt from the selective draft herein prescribed; and nothing in this act contained shall be construed to require or compel any person to serve in any of the forces herein provided for who is found to be a member of any well-recognized religious sect or organization at present organized and existing and whose existing creed or principles forbid its members to participate in war in any form and whose religious convictions are against war or participation therein in accordance with the creed or principles of said religious organizations, but no person so exempted shall be exempted from service in any capacity that the President shall declare to be noncombatant; and the President is hereby authorized to exclude or discharge from said selective draft and from the draft under the second paragraph of section 1 hereof, or to draft for partial military service only from those liable to draft as in this act provided, persons of the following classes: County and municipal officials; customhouse clerks; persons employed by the United States in the transmission of the mails; artificers and workmen employed in the armories, arsenals, and navy yards of the United States, and such other persons employed in the service of the United States as the President may designate; pilots; mariners actually employed in the sea service of any citizen or merchant within the United States; persons engaged in industries, including agriculture, found to be necessary to the maintenance of the Military Establishment or the effective operation of the military forces or the maintenance of national interest during the emergency; those in a status with respect to persons dependent upon them for support which renders their exclusion or discharge advisable; and those found to be physically or morally deficient. No exemption or exclusion shall continue when a cause therefor no longer exists: Provided, That notwithstanding the exemptions enumerated herein, each State, Territory, and the District of Columbia shall be required to supply its quota in the proportion that its population bears to the total population of the United States.

"The President is hereby authorized, in his discretion, to create and establish throughout the several States and subdivisions thereof and in the Territories and the District of Columbia local boards, and where, in his discretion, practicable and desirable, there shall be created and established one such local board in each county or similar subdivision in each State, and one for approximately each 30,000 of population in each city of 30,000 population or over, according to the last census taken or estimates furnished by the Bureau of Census of the Department of Commerce. Such boards shall be appointed by the President, and shall consist of three or more members, none of whom shall be connected with the Military Establishment, to be chosen from among the local authorities of such subdivisions or from other citizens residing in the subdivision or area in which the respective boards will have jurisdiction under the rules and regulations prescribed by the President. Such boards shall have power within their respective jurisdictions to hear and determine, subject to review as hereinafter provided, all questions of exemption under this act, and all questions of or claims for including or discharging individuals or classes of individuals from the selective draft, which shall be made under rules and regulations prescribed by the President, except any and every question or claim for including or excluding or discharging persons or classes of persons from the selective draft under the provisions of this act authorizing the President to exclude or discharge from the selective draft 'Persons engaged in industries, including agriculture, found to be necessary to the maintenance of the Military Establishment, or the effective operation of the military forces, or the maintenance of national interest during the emergency.'

"The President is hereby authorized to establish additional boards, one in each Federal judicial district of the United States, consisting of such number of citizens, not connected with the Military Establishment, as the President may determine, who shall be appointed by the President: The President is hereby authorized, in his discretion, to establish more than one such board in any Federal judicial district of the United States, or to establish one such board having jurisdiction of an area extending into more than one Federal judicial district.

"Such district boards shall review on appeal and affirm, modify or reverse any decision of any local board having jurisdiction in the area in which any such district board has jurisdiction under the rules and regulations prescribed by the President. Such district boards shall have exclusive original jurisdiction within their respective areas to hear and determine all questions or claims for including or excluding or discharging persons or classes of persons from the selective draft, under the provisions of this act, not included within the original jurisdiction of such local boards.

"The decisions of such district boards shall be final except that, in accordance with such rules and regulations as the President may prescribe, he may affirm, modify or reverse any such decision.

"Any vacancy in any such local board or district board shall be filled by the President, and any member of any such local board or district board may be removed and another appointed in his place by the President, whenever he considers that the interest of the Nation demands it.

"The President shall make rules and regulations governing the organization and procedure of such local boards and district boards, and providing for and governing appeals from such local boards to such district boards, and reviews of the decisions of any local board by the district board having jurisdiction, and determining and prescribing the several areas in which the respective local boards and district boards shall have jurisdiction, and all other rules and regulations necessary to carry out the terms and provisions of this section, and shall provide for the issuance of certificates of exemption, or partial or limited exemptions, and for a system to exclude and discharge individuals from selective draft.

"SEC. 5. That all male persons between the ages of 21 and 30, both inclusive, shall be subject to registration in accordance with regulations to be prescribed by the President; and upon proclamation by the President or other public notice given by him or by his direction stating the time and place of such registration it shall be the duty of all persons of the designated ages, except officers and enlisted men of the Regular Army, the Navy, and the National Guard and Naval Militia while in the service of the United States, to present themselves for and submit to registration under the provisions of this act; and every such person shall be deemed to have notice of the requirements of this act upon the publication of said proclamation or other notice as aforesaid given by the President or by his direction; and any person who shall willfully fail or refuse to present himself for registration or to submit thereto as herein provided shall be guilty of a misdemeanor and shall, upon conviction in the district court of the United States having jurisdiction thereof, be punished by imprisonment for not more than one year, and shall thereupon be duly registered: Provided, That in the call of the docket precedence shall be given, in courts trying the same, to the trial of criminal proceedings under this act: Provided further, That persons shall be subject to registration as herein provided who shall have attained their twenty-first birthday and who shall not have attained their thirty-first birthday on or before the day set for the registration, and all persons so registered shall be and remain subject to draft into the forces hereby authorized, unless exempted or excused therefrom as in this act provided: Provided further, That in the case of temporary absence from actual place of legal residence of any person liable to registration as provided herein such registration may be made by mail under regulations to be prescribed by the President.

"SEC. 6. That the President is hereby authorized to utilize the service of any or all departments and any or all officers or agents of the United States and of the several States, Territories, and the District of Columbia, and subdivisions thereof, in the execution of this act, and all officers and agents of the United States and of the several States, Territories, and subdivisions thereof, and of the District of Columbia, and all persons designated or appointed under regulations prescribed by the President whether such appointments are made by the President himself or by the governor or other officer of any State or Territory to perform any duty in the execution of this act, are hereby required to perform such duty as the President shall order or direct, and all such officers and agents and persons so designated or appointed shall hereby have full authority for all acts done by them in the execution of this act by the direction of the President. Correspondence in the execution of this act may be carried in penalty envelopes bearing the frank of the War Department. Any person charged as herein provided with the duty of carrying into effect any of the provisions of this act or the regulations made or directions given thereunder who shall fail or neglect to perform such duty; and any person charged with such duty or having and exercising any authority under said act, regulations, or directions, who shall knowingly make or be a party to the making of any false or incorrect registration, physical examination, exemption, enlistment, enrollment, or muster; and any person who shall make or be a party to the making of any false statement or certificate as to the fitness or liability of himself or any other person for service under the provisions of this act, or regulations made by the President thereunder, or otherwise evades or aids another to evade the requirements of this act or of said regulations, or who, in any manner, shall fail or neglect fully to perform any duty required of him in the execution of this act, shall, if not subject to military law, be guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction in the district court of the United States having jurisdiction thereof be punished by imprisonment for not more than one year, or, if subject to military law, shall be tried by court-martial and suffer such punishment as a court-martial may direct.

"SEC. 7. That the qualifications and conditions for voluntary enlistment as herein provided shall be the same as those prescribed by existing law for enlistments in the Regular Army, except that recruits must be between the ages of 18 and 40 years, both inclusive, at the time of their enlistment; and such enlistments shall be for the period of the emergency unless sooner discharged. All enlistments, including those in the Regular Army Reserve, which are in force on the date of the approval of this act and which would terminate during the emergency shall continue in force during the emergency unless sooner discharged; but nothing herein contained shall be construed to shorten the period of any existing enlistment: Provided, That all persons enlisted or drafted under any of the provisions of this act shall, as far as practicable, be grouped into units by States and the political subdivisions of the same: Provided further, That all persons who have enlisted since April 1, 1917, either in the Regular Army or in the National Guard, and all persons who have enlisted in the National Guard since June 3, 1916, upon their application, shall be discharged upon the termination of the existing emergency.

"The President may provide for the discharge of any or all enlisted men whose status with respect to dependents renders such discharge advisable; and he may also authorize the employment on any active duty of retired enlisted men of the Regular Army, either with their rank on the retired list or in higher enlisted grades, and such retired enlisted men shall receive the full pay and allowances of the grades in which they are actively employed.

"SEC. 8. That the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, is authorized to appoint for the period of the existing emergency such general officers of appropriate grades as may be necessary for duty with brigades, divisions, and higher units in which the forces provided for herein may be organized by the President, and general officers of appropriate grade for the several Coast Artillery districts. In so far as such appointments may be made from any of the forces herein provided for, the appointees may be selected irrespective of the grades held by them in such forces. Vacancies in all grades in the Regular Army resulting from the appointment of officers thereof to higher grades in the forces other than the Regular Army herein provided for shall be filled by temporary promotions and appointments in the manner prescribed for filling temporary vacancies by section 114 of the national-defense act approved June 3, 1916; and officers appointed under the provisions of this act to higher grades in the forces other than the Regular Army herein provided for shall not vacate their permanent commissions nor be prejudiced in their relative or lineal standing in the Regular Army.

"SEC. 9. That the appointments authorized and made as provided by the second, third, fourth, fifth, sixth, and seventh paragraphs of section 1 and by section 8 of this act, and the temporary appointments in the Regular Army authorized by the first paragraph of section 1 of this act shall be for the period of the emergency unless sooner terminated by discharge or otherwise. The President is hereby authorized to discharge any officer from the office held by him under such appointment for any cause which, in the judgment of the President, would promote the public service; and the general commanding any division and higher tactical organization or territorial department is authorized to appoint from time to time military boards of not less than three nor more than five officers of the forces herein provided for to examine into and report upon the capacity, qualification, conduct, and efficiency of any commissioned officer within his command other than officers of the Regular Army holding permanent or provisional commissions therein. Each member of such board shall be superior in rank to the officer whose qualifications are to be inquired into, and if the report of such board be adverse to the continuance of any such officer and be approved by the President, such officer shall be discharged from the service at the discretion of the President with one month's pay and allowances.

"SEC. 10. That all officers and enlisted men of the forces herein provided for other than the Regular Army shall be in all respects on the same footing as to pay, allowances, and pensions as officers and enlisted men of corresponding grades and length of service in the Regular Army; and commencing June 1, 1917, and continuing until the termination of the emergency, all enlisted men of the Army of the United States in active service whose base pay does not exceed $21 per month shall receive an increase of $10 per month; those whose base pay is $24, an increase of $8 per month; those whose base pay is $30, $36, or $40, an increase of $6 per month; and those whose base pay is $45 or more, an increase of $5 per month: Provided, That the increase of pay herein authorized shall not enter into the computation of continuous-service pay.

"SEC. 11. That all existing restrictions upon the detail, detachment, and employment of officers and enlisted men of the Regular Army are hereby suspended for the period of the present emergency.

"SEC. 12. That the President of the United States, as Commander in Chief of the Army, is authorized to make such regulations governing the prohibition of alcoholic liquors in or near military camps and to the officers and enlisted men of the Army as he may from time to time deem necessary or advisable: Provided, That no person, corporation, partnership, or association shall sell, supply, or have in his or its possession any intoxicating or spirituous liquors at any military station, cantonment, camp, fort, post, officers' or enlisted men's club, which is being used at the time for military purposes under this act, but the Secretary of War may make regulations permitting the sale and use of intoxicating liquors for medicinal purposes. It shall be unlawful to sell any intoxicating liquor, including beer, ale, or wine, to any officer or member of the military forces while in uniform, except as herein provided. Any person, corporation, partnership, or association violating the provisions of this section or the regulations made thereunder shall, unless otherwise punishable under the Articles of War, be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and be punished by a fine of not more than $1,000 or imprisonment for not more than 12 months, or both.

"SEC. 13. That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized, empowered, and directed during the present war to do everything by him deemed necessary to suppress and prevent the keeping or setting up of houses of ill fame, brothels, or bawdy houses within such distance as he may deem needful of any military camp, station, fort, post, cantonment, training, or mobilization place, and any person, corporation, partnership, or association receiving or permitting to be received for immoral purposes any person into any place, structure, or building used for the purpose of lewdness, assignation, or prostitution within such distance of said places as may be designated, or shall permit any such person to remain for immoral purposes in any such place, structure, or building as aforesaid, or who shall violate any order, rule, or regulation issued to carry out the object and purpose of this section shall, unless otherwise punishable under the Articles of War, be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and be punished by a fine of not more than $1,000, or imprisonment for not more than 12 months, or both.

"SEC. 14. That all laws and parts of laws in conflict with the provisions of this act are hereby suspended during the period of this emergency."

And the Senate agree to the same.

STATEMENT.

The managers on the part of the House at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 3545) to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States, submit the following written statement explaining the effect of the action agreed on:

The bill as reported back is identically the same as the one reported in Report No. 49, Sixty-fifth Congress, first session, with the exception of the incorporation of the Senate provision, commonly known as the Roosevelt amendment, providing for four divisions to be raised under the volunteer system.

The managers call attention, however, to the fact that said printed report hereto referred to and made a part hereof is amended so as to make its provisions conform to the organization of said four divisions of volunteers.

On page 5 of the printed conference report, after the word "draft" and before the quotation, beginning with the word "persons" and ending with the word "emergency," there should be no punctuation. The bill itself is so drawn and the mistake is made in the printed copy.

S. H. DENT, Jr.,
W. J. FIELDS,
PERCY E. QUIN,
D. R. ANTHONY, Jr.,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD] expects to make a motion to recommit the conference report. I suggest that he be permitted to offer that motion so that it may be pending and that there be some time for debate agreed upon.

Mr. DENT. How much time does the gentleman suggest?

Mr. MANN. Not to exceed half an hour on a side.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that debate on this report be limited to one hour, one half to be controlled by the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] and the other half by myself.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, may I ask the gentleman from Alabama if it is the purpose to have a vote at the expiration of the hour?

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, I will add to that request that the previous question be considered as ordered upon the adoption of the report and the motion to recommit at the expiration of one hour.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that debate on this conference report be limited to one hour, one half to be controlled by himself and the other half by the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN], and that at the end of that time the previous question shall be considered as ordered upon the report and the motion to recommit, which is to be offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD]. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following motion to recommit, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

By Mr. GOOD: I move to recommit the report with instructions to agree to that portion of the Senate amendment reading as follows:

"That all officers and enlisted men of the forces herein provided for, other than the Regular Army, shall be in all respects on the same footing as to pay, allowances, and pensions as officers and enlisted men of corresponding grades and length of service in the Regular Army: Provided, That on and after May 1, 1917, the pay of all men with the rating of enlisted men during the continuance of the war shall be increased $14 a month over and above the rates of pay proper as fixed by law for times of peace: Provided further, That this rate of pay shall apply to enlisted men of the National Guard and to those in the Regular Army now enlisted, called, or drafted into the service of the United States during the war," with an amendment, so that when amended it will read as follows:

"That all officers and enlisted men of the forces herein provided for, other than the Regular Army, shall be in all respects on the same footing as to pay, allowances, and pensions as officers and enlisted men of corresponding grades and length of service in the Regular Army; and commencing June 1, 1917, and continuing until the termination of the emergency, all enlisted men of the Army of the United States in active service whose base pay does not exceed $21 per month shall receive an increase of $15 per month; those whose base pay is $24, an increase of $12 per month; those whose base pay is $30, $36, or $40, an increase of $8 per month; and those whose base pay is $45 or more, an increase of $6 per month: Provided, That the increases of pay herein authorized shall not enter into the computation of continuous-service pay."

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, I hardly consider it necessary to enter into any further details in explanation of the conference report. Suffice it to say that this particular report is exactly the same as that submitted by the conferees reported on last Saturday, with the single exception of incorporating the so-called Roosevelt amendment, providing for four voluntary divisions to be engrafted on the draft system.

I desire, however, to submit briefly a few remarks and some figures upon the proposition of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD] to recommit this bill for the purpose of increasing the pay of the enlisted men. As well as the conferees could, with the limited time they had, they went as thoroughly into this question as possible. I am sure that it would be absolutely impossible to adopt any system of pay that could be said to be perfect, so that whatever we agree on here or whatever was agreed on in conference, or whatever is suggested by the gentleman from Iowa, is bound to be more or less an arbitrary matter when you come to fix the compensation of the private soldier. I notice that the gentleman from Iowa has changed the form in which this proposition was originally submitted. Originally, it provided a flat increase of $15 a month for every enlisted man in the Army, which, of course, included all of the noncommissioned officers. I stated on the floor the other day that the adoption of that would mean that corporals would receive less pay than privates, and that some sergeants would receive more pay than a second lieutenant who was in command of them.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Speaker, may I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. DENT. Let me finish my explanation and then I shall be glad to yield. My statement with reference to corporals was accurate, but it may have been misleading to this extent—that is to say, the adoption of the $10 increase rate might also operate in the same way—I am now willing to confess that; but my statement with reference to the pay of a sergeant exceeding that of a second lieutenant was absolutely accurate.

Mr. AUSTIN. May I ask the gentleman a question there?

Mr. DENT. Yes.

Mr. AUSTIN. What is the pay of a sergeant?

Mr. DENT. There are different kinds of sergeants.

Mr. AUSTIN. The highest pay?

Mr. DENT. The highest pay of a sergeant is $99 a month.

Mr. AUSTIN. Fifteen dollars added to that would be $114. What is the pay of a second lieutenant?

Mr. DENT. I will ask the gentleman to let me submit what I have to say in my own way.

Mr. AUSTIN. I thought the gentleman yielded to me to ask a question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman declined to yield.

Mr. DENT. I do not propose to stand up and be catechised.

Mr. AUSTIN. No; I asked the gentleman a question. I thought he agreed I might ask him a question.

Mr. DENT. I did; and I answered it. Now, for instance, the pay of a sergeant master signal electrician, or, if you please, chief musician, is $99 a month. Let it also be remembered that the enlisted men, including noncommissioned officers, have an allowance of rations and clothing, which the officer does not get. Let it also be remembered that under the law as it now exists every enlisted man in the Army when on foreign service gets an increase of 20 per cent in his pay. Then, if you take these figures of $99 a month, the sergeant now would get $1,188 a year, a clothing allowance of $67.85, a ration allowance of $109.50, and 20 per cent additional pay for foreign service, amounting to $237.60, making a total of $1,602.95, whereas the pay of a second lieutenant is $1,700. If you increase this rate of pay by $15 a month, we find that the base pay of a master signal electrician would be $1,368, his clothing allowance $67.85, has ration allowance $109.50, and his 20 per cent additional pay for foreign service $273.60, making a total annual pay of a master electrician of $1,818.95, or $100 more than a second lieutenant, who is in command over him.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. DENT. Yes, sir.

Mr. SLAYDEN. He has the retirement privilege, has he not, at a larger percentage?

Mr. DENT. Oh, of course he has that. Now, Mr. Speaker, I want to add one other thing. I have carefully figured what it would cost the Government, based on the present strength of the Army, or rather the strength of the Army as reported to the Committee on Military Affairs at the last session by The Adjutant General. If we adopt the plan of increasing this pay $15 a month, and if we adopt the plan recommended by the conferees, according to the figures given by The Adjutant General at the last session of Congress, and they are the last figures the committee had, we had 112,000 enlisted men in the Army. Increasing their base pay at $5 a month, we would increase the pay of the Army as it then existed by $1,127,140. If we increase it $15, we increase it by $1,690,710. Then, if we will figure the increased pay that goes to the noncommissioned officers, we will find that under the plan proposed and agreed to by the conferees that the additional cost would be $1,405,961 for an army of about 150,000 men, whereas under the plan of increasing this cost by $15 a month the cost of an army of 150,000 men would be $2,312,295.

In other words, it would cost $900,000 per month extra for every 150,000 men in the Army if we adopt the plan of increasing the pay by $15 a month. Now, Mr. Speaker, I do not think when you take into consideration that the American soldier is fed and clothed, when you take into consideration the fact that he has no actual necessary expenses, it is not fair at this day and time to increase his pay 100 per cent. I think that the conferees have been liberal and fair enough when they give to the private soldier $25 a month. And let it not be forgotten that when he is sent on foreign service that $25 a month—and that is the very lowest pay he gets—is increased one-fifth—$5 a month—so that he will be actually getting on foreign service $30 a month under the plan proposed by the conferees. I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. AUSTIN].

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Speaker, this House, when the military bill was under consideration, adopted my amendment by a unanimous vote increasing the pay of all enlisted men $15 per month. There was a division in the House, and 250 Members stood up and went on record in favor of the amendment and not a vote in the negative. I took that same amendment to the Senate, where it was offered as an amendment to the Senate bill. There was some discussion. The Senate amended or changed that amendment because some Senators thought that it would double the pay of noncommissioned officers, and in order to give the conferees jurisdiction they changed the wording and also changed the amount from $15 to $14, so as to make it a subject of conference. I do not think there was a vote in the United States Senate against it. In the discussion there Senator WEEKS, who offered the substitute to make it subject to conference between the two Houses, said:

> I assume that the conferees will understand that the purpose is to raise the pay of all enlisted men $15 a month.

Now, what happened? The Senate substituted their bill for the House bill, and when it came back here, under the rules of this House, we could not disagree except to the entire bill. We could not have a vote on that amendment. The conferees—the five Members of this House and three Members of the Senate—did what? They rewrote this section, and they took away from the private soldier $5 a month, against the united action of this House and the united vote of the Senate. What else did they do? They changed the date. The House made that amendment to take effect on the 1st day of May, the Senate the 1st day of April, and the conferees made it take effect the 1st day of July. Now, after the Senate acted on our bill and sent it back, that provision would have been subject to a point of order, had the Senate not substituted its bill for ours, on the ground that the conferees had no right to reduce that amount below the minimum amount fixed in the bill by the Senate or increase it beyond the amount fixed in the House, and had no right to change the date except to change it between the 1st of April and the 1st of May. What happened? Why, the five Members of this House and the three Members of the Senate, disregarding the united voice of both Houses of Congress, changed it against our united action.

Who fixed this amount of $25 per month? Somebody in the War Department. I have stood here and voted for every proposition in the interests of the war, but I think we have reached the time when one or two men in the War Department should not absolutely veto the united voice of the Senate and the House. [Applause.] Where is there a man in this House who will put his hand on his heart and remember his conscience and say that $25 a month is a sufficient sum of money to pay our brave soldiers, thousands and thousands of whom will sacrifice their lives, and thousands of whom will return to their homes sightless and legless? Ninety per cent of our Army will be made up of the plain, common people who are placing their lives on the altar of their country, yet the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs tells us it is going to cost $1,000,000 or $2,000,000 more. Can you measure the sacrifices of these men in dollars, the lives which will be lost, the limbs they will part with, the suffering and hardships they will endure? Their sufferings, hardships, and losses can not be measured in the paltry, contemptible sum of $25 a month.

Mr. DENT. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. AUSTIN. I will if I can have a little more time.

Mr. DENT. I will yield the gentleman one minute so that I can ask him one question.

What does he think about the difference between the paltry sum of $29 and $25?

Mr. AUSTIN. I will go with you and make it what the little Government of Australia makes it, $45 a month; and the population of that country is less than the population of the Empire State of New York. The 4,000,000 people in Australia can pay their patriotic sons $45 a month, and Canada, with a population of 10,000,000, less than New York State, can pay their soldiers $33 a month; but we can vote $7,000,000,000 for this war, we can give our allies $3,000,000,000 of that money, perhaps even to pay the Canadian soldiers $33 a month, or the Australian soldiers $45 a month, but we can not see the wisdom and justice and fairness of giving our own brave and patriotic American soldiers $30 a month. [Applause.]

Mr. CALDWELL. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. AUSTIN. If you will give me some time in which to do it.

Mr. CALDWELL. I have not the time and therefore can not yield. I wanted to ask a question.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. DEWALT in the chair). The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. AUSTIN. Gentlemen, let us have a record vote on this proposition and let our constituents know who is opposed to paying the pitiable sum of $30 a month to the boys in the trenches and those doing service in our own country.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. KAHN. I yield one minute more to the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. AUSTIN. The chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs in the Senate, who was on this conference committee, said that he and the Secretary of War were opposed to an increase, namely, that $15 a month, the amount paid in times of peace, was sufficient in time of war. I repudiate it as unjust, unfair, and un-American, and deserving the condemnation of this House. [Applause.]

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD].

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, I dislike very much to disagree with my good friend from California [Mr. KAHN] on this subject and with the majority of the committee. But it is only going to take a very little while this morning to correct an injustice and to do that which is only fair to the enlisted men, if we but take the time now. To-morrow it will be too late.

In a conversation the other day with a gentleman of the Committee on Military Affairs he told me that I was mistaken on this subject, and that the pay to-day of the enlisted man in our Army was more than the pay of the enlisted man in any army of the world. As soon as I received that information I took up the subject with the War Department. I took the matter up with The Adjutant General's Office. I was informed there that they had no information in that department with regard to the pay of the enlisted men in other armies and was referred to the Quartermaster General. I then made inquiry there. I was sent from one man to another until I had interviewed four officers in the Quartermaster's Department. All of them told me they knew nothing in that department regarding the pay of enlisted men in other armies, and I was told to go to the Council of National Defense. I called up the Council of National Defense and was told they had no information on the subject. I then went to the Congressional Library, and Judge Thompson furnished me with the information that the pay of the enlisted man in Canada is $33 per month, the pay of the enlisted man in New Zealand is $37.50 per month, and the pay of the enlisted man in Australia is $45 a month.

Mr. CALDWELL. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. GOOD. No; I can not yield. Forty-five dollars a month is the pay in Australia. Think of it. Australia pays her enlisted men three times as much as we pay the enlisted man to-day in the Army of the United States.

Mr. AUSTIN. Let me ask the gentleman this question, that if in Canada they do not make an allowance for the wives and children?

Mr. GOOD. Yes; they make an allowance of $20 a month for the wife and $5 a month for a dependent child. This, however, is paid from the patriotic fund raised by taxation on land and in other ways; but it is paid, which is the point. All I have attempted in this amendment is to increase the pay, and to do this I have adopted the language of the conference report. Where the conference report gives the enlisted man an increase of $10 a month, I have increased it to $15 a month, so that the pay of the enlisted man in the United States will be $30 a month instead of $25.

Now, claim will be made that the men of the United States will receive 20 per cent additional while in foreign service, and that is true. But it is not the present intention of the War Department to send very many of the million men that we have appropriated for abroad during the next year. Those men will be in the United States. They will be taken from the farms, from the workshops, the factories, the banking houses, and other institutions, where many of them receive good wages. The pay of the average men on the farms to-day throughout the country is more than $36 a month. In many places it is as much as $50 a month. And when you conscript a boy from the farm and send him to guard a bridge or do other service in the United States in the Army, or send him to the trenches abroad, his father must hire some one to take his place. But, they say, you must do it because of patriotism. I am perfectly willing to adopt that if you will reconstruct your Army bill and fix the pay on the theory of patriotism.

But unfortunately that is not the plan on which our Army is constructed. The pay of a lieutenant general of the Army—while we have none at present, but will have—is $11,000 a year. You have provided the pay of the brigadier general at $8,000 a year.

A MEMBER. A major general.

Mr. GOOD. Yes; a major general, at $8,000 a year. Are we, the Representatives of the people, to say that the boy in the trench is going to make all of the sacrifice, and that he must offer up all of the patriotism, and that the man away back out of danger is to receive all of the pay? I want the boy to do his part, but I want to pay him a living wage. It will be a sad commentary on the democracy for which we fight if we send our boys to the trenches to fight along with the Canadians, who get $33 a month; to fight along with the soldiers from Australia, who get $45 a month—or $15 a month more than our soldiers serving in the United States; or $9 more than our soldiers, even after they receive the allowance of 20 per cent for foreign service.

A major general to-day receives the pay of 45 privates, and even under your amendment he will receive a pay equal to the combined pay of 26 privates. You are exempting the boys who work in the munition factories in the United States. They are exempted from military service. Those boys will get on the average of from $5 to $10 a day, making the shot and shell that the boys in the trench must use. You exempt him, but you say to the enlisted man, to the man whom you are going to draft, "You go to the trenches, and go there at the risk of your life, and at the sacrifice of 50 per cent and even 100 per cent of your earning power." [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has used eight minutes.

Mr. GOOD. I reserve the rest of my time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman reserves two minutes.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. THOMAS].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Kentucky is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, it is true that Congress has been quite a while, as charged by some persons, considering this important Army measure. One great trouble with a portion of the public is if legislation is enacted which it does not approve it declares that such legislation is hasty and ill advised and passed without due consideration. On the other hand, if it approves certain legislation, however important and far reaching it may be, it demands that such measure be enacted into law immediately and without sufficient or no consideration, and if such course is not pursued Congress is severely censured for the apparent delay. A measure of such importance and far-reaching significance, and one fraught with such possible portentous and tremendous results to this Nation as the one now under consideration, should and has received the most earnest and deliberative thought of this Congress.

Every Member of Congress realizes that we must have an army and all are bending their best energies to attain that result. Every Member of Congress, I believe, is willing to make any needed sacrifice for the ultimate triumph of our country. There is no difference of opinion on that point. All are anxious to attain the same desirable end, and the only difference of opinion is as to the best method to attain that end. A part of Congress believes it is best from the beginning to use force, compulsion, conscription to provide an army, while others just as earnestly and honestly believe that our battles can best be fought and victory made more certain by the use of volunteers, men who are willing to fight from motives of patriotism. They believe that instead of using compulsion to raise an army the appeal should be made to the patriotism of a people who have never failed to gallantly respond when the country needed their service.

All legislation is of necessity the result of compromise, and if Congress can not agree on the best measure it should and will accept the best that can be agreed on. I do not believe in conscription except as a means to compel those who first having had an opportunity to enlist in the service, other than the Regular Army, fail to do so. I believe the people of this country are opposed to conscription as a means of raising an army. The idea of force and compulsion is repugnant to their ideas of patriotism. I shall support the measure determined upon by a majority of this House, trusting and hoping it may prove satisfactory and at least accomplish the desired result, as well as meet the most hopeful expectations of its advocates.

I hold in my hand a clipping from the Washington Post, a newspaper of recent date. I shall not utter any unlovable words toward that paper because it has not, so far as I am aware, done anything to me. If it had the case might be different. [Laughter.]

Gen. Sherman, who had ample experience to know, gave the correct, if forcible and picturesque, definition of war. Men must be trained and disciplined in a rough, hard, and exacting school to be fitted for fighting soldiers.

Luxurious camp living, wrist watches, hot food, and servants to wait on them may fit men for parlor warriors, but can never be a means of properly preparing them for the stern and frightful realities of war.

Bye and bye I will read a part of the paper clipping to which I have just referred, and some portions of it are rich, rare, and racy, and also somewhat instructive and entertaining, as well as mighty interesting reading.

We have a military training school at Fort Myer, just across the Potomac and within the shadow of historic Arlington, where immortal heroes are sleeping their last sleep. I understand there are now at Fort Myer over 2,000 men and boys in training for Army officers, and I trust they may all be successful in passing and that each of them will become a military ornament to his country and a fighting soldier. I say fighting soldier because there is a vast difference between a soldier and a fighting soldier. A volunteer is usually a fighting soldier, and a conscript usually just a soldier. [Applause.]

Pardon the digression, but I will state my information is that over 250,000 men have offered their services to the country in this war, 60,000 of whom are willing to enlist as privates and fight in the trenches, while over 200,000 have offered their services provided they are given commissions as Army officers. [Laughter.]

In my opinion the idea of conscription is unpopular with the masses. I believe it has fallen on the country like a wet blanket, and has much to do with the unwillingness of men to volunteer.

I will now read a part of the clipping to which I referred. It says:

It was 10 o'clock by the rookie's wrist watch when taps sounded last night and he crawled in his bunk to sleep. [Laughter.]

So it seems the rookie at Fort Myer is at least being trained in the use of the wrist watch, just like Pauline and Maude. I am not informed as to whether the Government furnishes the rookies wrist-watch ornaments as a part of their equipage, but presume not, though later on the rookie may file an account against the Government for the price of these formidable, ferocious, and apparently necessary weapons.

Probably, however, wrist watches are a necessary accompaniment to military training and will be quite valuable as a bulwark of safety in the trenches in France.

The clipping says further:

He (the rookie) went to the camp surgeon and was vaccinated in the arm with typhoid prophylactic and in the chest with paratyphoid prophylactic. Several men fainted.

It was very proper that the rookie should be vaccinated, but it seems to me entirely out of order for a would-be soldier and expectant officer at that, who may have to face cannon and bayonets and poisonous gases and blood and death in European trenches, to become unnerved on having to encounter such a small, harmless, and insignificant thing as a surgeon's needle.

The clipping further says:

The equipage given each man consisted of shoes, hats, uniforms and other clothing, and for his quarters he got two blankets, two pillow cases, a pillow, four sheets, mattress, and a folding cot. Uncle Sam has provided desirable quarters.

Well, I should think he has [laughter], but the tragedy of it all is that here is furnished at just one dash out of the box more comfort, not to say luxury, than many a farmer's boy who has been of some real service to his country ever had in all his life.

And next the clipping joyfully says:

They have got servants out there.

That is, the rookies are furnished servants to wait on them, to shine their shoes, may be, serve them when dining and perhaps in any other menial capacity required. That is certainly convenient for the rookie, however hard it may be on the servant. The chronicler, however, does not state whether these servants are gentlemen of Senegambian origin or the plain "little buck privates," as the same paper so flippantly characterizes the private who has enlisted in the ranks to fight for his country with no particular hope of reward but the consciousness of duty well and faithfully performed. I fear there will not be sufficient privates to go around. [Laughter.]

The article mournfully continues:

A lot of rookies would have missed their dinner yesterday had it not been for Washington women who have volunteered to serve during the war.

I am glad to know that the good women of Washington are eager to serve and have freely volunteered for the war. I am glad to know that it was not necessary to conscript them, but I fear the case is different with the male population of Washington. The article further says the Red Cross went out to Fort Myer and took them provisions. It would have been appalling if not heart-rending had the rookies missed their dinner, but thanks to the Red Cross and thoughtful women of Washington, that dire catastrophe was averted. It would have been a rank injustice had not the rookies been supplied with warm food and all the delicacies of the season to appease their fastidious appetites. It would have been one of the great tragedies of this war, and maybe, though I trust not, some of them expect, should they be so unfortunate as to be sent to the French trenches, to be supplied with silver service, warm food, ornamental wrist watches, and an abundance of servants, after the fashion of English officers, to wait on them. [Laughter.]

I have heard it "norated" around in the neighborhood, but can not vouch for the correctness of the statement, that the real trouble about the food was that the rookies demanded warm victuals, and balked at the rations furnished by Uncle Sam.

They may think they are meanly used by Uncle Sam, but if they are sent to Europe they will be fortunate if they receive a sufficient amount of cold horse meat on which to subsist. If they only realized it they are eating their white bread now.

No doubt Phyllis and Gladys and all the other beautiful bevies of lovely Washington girls will take their way to Fort Myer, transported in luxurious and richly appointed limousines. Perhaps they will be chaperoned by Mrs. Van Style, resplendent in silks and jewels. May be on the seat beside each of them will be sitting a worthless bulldog wearing a golden collar around his neck. They will go to call on Cholly the deah boy, to bring him sympathy and sweet consolation for the trials and sufferings he has endured because of his manly and courageous attacks on Uncle Sam's rations, and no doubt will faint along with the male fainters when they learn the real horrible conditions. No doubt they will nearly weep their lovely eyes out with briny tears, and their little tender hearts will almost be broken. [Laughter.]

The soldiers of the Civil War, North and South, the bravest the world ever saw, carried their worldly posessions on their backs in a knapsack, and considered themselves fortunate to get bacon and hardtack and to be afforded the opportunity, when the army was moving, of riding on top of a freight box car. May be the rookies will demand Pullman palaces in which to travel, as well as the other accessories of which I have spoken.

Luxurious quarters, delicate food, and half training will not make soldiers, and no doubt the stern drill masters at Fort Myer will soon dispel the magnificent ideas of the rookie, and will subject him to such work and drilling as will make soldiers. The rookie is usually a manly fellow and a game cock, and when his verdant military ideas are obliterated by stern military discipline he will make a first-class courageous soldier worthy of the traditions of his country.

The approval of a good and beautiful woman is always an inspiration, but it takes something more than ice cream and cake and lobster salad and the sweet smiles of lovely girls to make a soldier, though the latter will go a long way in that direction. [Laughter.]

This measure should apply to all citizens with equal favor. The laws, like the dews of heaven, should fall on all alike, the just and the unjust. Not even that mighty Nimrod, slayer of pet bears and decrepit lions, the famous discoverer of the mystical River of Doubt, and the mythical hero of San Juan should be granted any special privileges by the provisions of this measure.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Kentucky has expired.

Mr. THOMAS. Will you grant me a few minutes more?

Mr. DENT. I yield to the gentleman one minute.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Kentucky is recognized for one minute more.

Mr. THOMAS. I can not, try as I may, dispel from my mind the memory of that mighty and inspiring preparedness demonstration held in this goodly city, with all its multiplicity and abundance of promises to enlist and serve the country faithfully in case the then prospective hostilities should eventuate. Events have since proved that the multiplicity of those promises have been equaled only by the paucity of performance.

As evidence of these facts, I notice in the newspapers that in one day recently, in this city, 59 persons joined the chamber of commerce, while only 2 enlisted in the service. It seems to me that if this were not the age of steam, and sailing vessels were still in use, the city of Washington, judging from its recent past, could furnish sufficient wind as a motive power to propel the mightiest and most magnificent fleet that ever sailed the Seven Seas.

It seems that they are more ready to enlist for business than for war, and my observations, since I have been in Congress, lead me to the conclusion that some of the population of this town are more ready to loot the Public Treasury than to serve the country in time of peril.

There are many Government employees here, who claim, as I understand, that they can not go to war because their services are indispensable to the proper conduct of public business. The services of no man or set of men is at all necessary to the proper conduct of the public affairs of this Nation. Two-thirds of the employees in the departments could enlist in the Army and their services would not be missed. Women who need the work could be employed to fill their places and would fill them as well or better than the men. This is notably true in the stenographic and typewriting department. And yet the Government holds examinations for this service to which the women are not admitted, and this is a rank injustice. Women are usually more industrious, more faithful, more competent, more truthful, and more dependable than men, and should at least be given an equal opportunity in all examinations. Let the men enlist and fight and the women stay at home and work, and weep, and pray. [Applause.]

I believe, after all, the volunteer system is the best for the success of our arms. Had the President issued a call for a million volunteers and called on each State to furnish its quota, an army would have sprung to the defense of the Nation almost overnight. Training camps could have been established in every State and the volunteers trained by Regular Army officers. A generous and friendly rivalry among the States to furnish the best trained soldiers would have in a short time produced the bravest and most effective fighting force the world ever saw.

We need fleets more than armies, and submarines and aeroplanes more than clanking sabers and the glimmer of golden lace. The Nation has been unduly alarmed by repeated hysterical predictions of the coming of mythical armies and phantom fleets that are about to invade our shores and conquer and destroy us.

Our danger does not lie in that direction. It lies along the ocean pathways in line of the lean and pitiless pirates of the seas, the submarines, and in the trenches of Europe.

Congress will pass a measure of some character to provide an army. The American patriot will willingly respond to his country's call. The flag of our country, the free heart's hope and home, has never yet gone down in defeat, and will wave in triumph from the age-beaten battlements of feudal Europe. [Applause.]

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. ALMON].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Alabama is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. ALMON. Mr. Speaker, the House fixed the monthly wages of the private soldier at $30, the Senate $29. The conferees, in violation of the express will of both Houses, have in this report fixed it at $25, and I have heard of no good reason why this was done. We have been increasing the wages and salaries of all Government employees from time to time, especially during the past two years, on account of the high cost of living. The cost of living is greater to-day than it has ever been. Wages are higher in all lines of business to-day than at any time in the history of our Nation. Young men will volunteer and be drafted into the military service who are commanding good wages and salaries. In many cases several times $25 per month. I am heartily in favor of the motion to recommit with instructions to the conferees to report $30 per month wages for the private soldier. It is no answer to this motion to say that it will cause delay in the final passage of this bill. The conferees could get together in a few minutes and amend their report in accordance with the motion to recommit.

There is another feature of the conference report that I am opposed to. When this bill passed the House and the Senate, it was expressly provided that the question of exemptions from military service of those who were engaged in industries, including agriculture, and those having others dependent upon them for support should be passed upon by boards of local officers or other citizens in the respective counties. The conference report changes this without an expression from either the House or the Senate, and has made provision for the question of exemptions of those engaged in industries, including farming, shall be passed upon by additional boards established by the President in each Federal judicial district of the United States. I am in favor of the exemptions of all these classes being passed upon and determined by the one board, as provided by the bill when it passed the House and the Senate. I would rather depend upon these county boards to do the right and fair thing than to leave it to a board appointed from the Federal judicial districts, which in many cases embraces a great many counties. I also believe that the local board could do the work quicker and more effectively.

I do not believe that the time has come when the local authorities in the respective counties can not be depended upon to pass on the question of exemption of those engaged in industries, including farming, as well as those engaged in other kinds of business. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. ALMON. Mr. Speaker, I make the same request.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama?

There was no objection.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL].

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I hesitate even to take five minutes, because I am anxious that this bill shall go along on its way to the President. But the few moments it will take to consider this very important measure will not be time wasted, for the bill can be sent to the President to-day after considering this matter, which is of very great importance.

This is incomparably the richest Government engaged in this war. It has been our boast that we pay the highest wage paid by any country in the world. It is proposed to conscript an army. The army is not given an opportunity to volunteer, to show its patriotism by making a voluntary service for the country generally. The conferees agreed to a bill conscripting or drafting the young men of the country from positions in which they received on the farm an average of $36 a month, and from other employments a much higher wage, and it is proposed to force them into the military service at a wage of $25 a month.

It is well at this time to look forward, because a year from now, or 2 years from now, or 10 years from now we will be looking backward to this thing. Men will be explaining what was done with the billions of money that were appropriated, raised by resorting to every variety of taxation. What was done with it? Why was it that the conscript soldier was forced to take the pittance of $25 a month, with all this money that has been raised for the use of this war?

The most important service that will be rendered to the United States during the period of this war will be rendered by the men who do the fighting, by the men who execute orders in the trenches and on the field. These men under the provisions of this bill as it now stands will receive $25 a month if the motion of the gentleman from Iowa to recommit the bill is not agreed to. I submit, therefore, that this bill should be hurriedly recommitted to the conferees with instructions to report it back to the House this afternoon with the provision as originally agreed upon by the House and Senate, making the pay of the soldier $30 a month. That will make it more nearly equal to the pay of the soldiers of Australia, New Zealand, and Canada, whom it is proposed our boys shall meet in the trenches at the front.

Mr. CALDWELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. No; the gentleman from New York is in favor of conscripting the boys who are receiving anywhere from $25 to $125 a month now, and forcing them to work in the trenches as soldiers at $25 a month, and I can not yield to him. I believe that this bill should be recommitted and brought back here providing for the pay agreed upon by the House when the bill was before us. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, I yield 4 minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS].

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Speaker, the war resolution was passed on April 5. The war has proceeded for 40 days. The conscription bill passed April 27, passed the Senate April 28, and the conference report has been presented and voted down once. The gentleman from Iowa now proposes to vote it down again. The three big questions in this bill was, first, conscription, and good men differed about that and we had an intense fight on it, but that is over; it is settled; that is water gone over the wheel and out of the way. The next big fight was the Roosevelt amendment, and that is settled and out of the way. Now the gentleman from Iowa comes here and attacks the entire report and asks that it be voted down, and for what? Over a detail as to the salary of the Army. It is a detail because no systematic plan has been worked out for the salaries of the several men in the Army. For example, this conference report gives $25 per month to those soldiers who serve at home and 20 per cent increase for those who serve abroad, which makes about $30 if they go abroad. It is almost 100 per cent increase on the salaries they now receive. They now receive $15. This is almost 100 per cent increase over the salaries received in both the Spanish and Civil Wars. I am for good salaries and good treatment for our defenders, but that desire does not call for a voting down of this entire army organization bill. It is asking altogether too much. It should not be done.

As the chairman of the committee [Mr. DENT] has explained to the House, this proposal, if adopted, would give the men more than some of the officers who command them, and that is a ridiculous thing for this House to do and a ridiculous thing for Congress to do. It simply shows how unfortunate it is to put on poorly digested amendments that have received no consideration by the committee. They ought not to do it. If the gentleman from Iowa thinks that they ought to have more pay all along the line, let him bring in a salary bill, let it go to the committee where they can work out a scientific plan whereby the officers and the men may have salaries adjusted along some systematic line.

I have not agreed with a large part of these war proposals, and all I desired was to call the attention of the House to the fact that we ought not every day in the week to vote down this conference report. The time has come when the American people conclude that the House ought to work with a little more speed, and they ought to accomplish more. This war has been in progress 40 days and here we are seeking to delay this for another week.

Mr. HELVERING. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FERRIS. Yes.

Mr. HELVERING. I want to call the gentleman's attention to the fact that these men will get $12 more a month than they got in the Spanish-American War.

Mr. FERRIS. Yes. I want to call attention to the fact that in the Civil War Congress was in session about a month, and here we have been almost two months, and we ought not again to vote down this conference report, even though some may feel that some of the men ought to have a little more pay. We are in war. We are expected to raise an army. This entire matter is being held up by this bill. The country is entitled to action. Delays are dangerous. This delay is not warranted. This entire matter can be worked out along systematic lines. It has no place here. It smacks of delay, if not of politics, and I submit this is no time for either.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FERRIS. Yes.

Mr. AUSTIN. Does the gentleman not believe that the increase of pay of the private soldier will help to secure volunteers and make the conscription more satisfactory?

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Speaker, the volunteer question is out of this proposition. We have voted to conscript the boys, and they are to be conscripted. The Government ought to have the right to begin the organization of this army, to the end that not only the Congress may not be rendered ridiculous but the Republic as well. [Applause.] We have entered this war, and it is not a question whether we like war or do not like war.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FERRIS. Yes.

Mr. HARDY. I just wish to state that in Texas I believe the average rate of farm labor is not equal to the $25 a month and food.

Mr. FERRIS. The gentleman would know better than I about that, and I accept his statement. I desire to state to gentlemen on the other side of the House that the Republicans have in the past shown unusual, almost unparalleled patriotism in helping to get this work done, and they ought not to join the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD] in an effort to dawdle along with this and vote this bill down every day or two. The matter is not of far-reaching consequence and can be adjusted any day. It is a matter that can be worked out later and more scientifically.

I desire to say one word about the gentleman from Alabama. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. DENT] and his committee have had a trying ordeal to go through. They have been voted down and kicked and knocked around already too long. It ought to be stopped. The conference report increases the salary of private soldiers practically 100 per cent. I am in favor of this increase. I reserve the right to increase it again, but this report must be passed. The organization of an army should proceed. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Oklahoma has expired.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, I yield four minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER].

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, I am in favor of the Good amendment, and for reasons that to me are sound. In the first place, this bill does not call to the service men from 19 to 25, as originally proposed. It calls men to the service between the ages of 21 and 31. As we advance the age we more and more draw to the service men who are married, with families dependent upon them.

Mr. GORDON. Those are exempted under the law.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. You just keep quiet while I use up my own time in my own way. [Laughter.] We are not only seeking to call these men to the defense of the country, but we command that they come. I for one do not believe that we have the right to command a man with a family dependent upon him for support unless we at the same time pay him a sufficient wage, which will enable him in some measure to support that family. This is not a matter of detail; it is not a trivial matter. The gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS] says it is not of sufficient importance to occupy our time. Good God, what is of sufficient importance to occupy the time of Congress? Two million men are to be called to their country's service, and whether we pay them the amount they deserve or not is to me an important factor. [Applause.]

Mr. FERRIS rose.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I can not yield.

We need not worry because to do this right will take a few more hours. We can do it to-day, or we can at least do it to-morrow. If it ought to be done, let us do it. Anything that is worth doing at all is worth doing well. [Applause.] I have no sympathy for the argument that if we increase the pay of the private to $30 a month that will give him more than a corporal is receiving, and therefore that should not be done. How absurd! Reduced to its last terms, it means that because a corporal is underpaid we likewise should underpay the private. Let us pay the private what he needs, and then give to the corporal and the sergeant the advanced pay that they need. Let us support this Army right. Let us equip it with the best devices ingenuity can devise and money can buy. Let us give the boys to know that when they go to perform their duty in their country's service their pay will be such that their families can in a measure be cared for and supported. It is not true that married men and those with dependents are necessarily exempt. The law says they may be exempted but does not say they shall be. If this war is a real war everyone knows many more millions must be called, and married men will be drafted. This is not entirely theoretical. We all had experience during the period of the mobilization of the National Guard last summer. One of the greatest disadvantages that accrued was because of the dependent families left by the men who were then in one sense drafted to go upon the border.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has expired.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN].

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER] is entirely in error when he states that we propose to take into the Army men with families dependent upon them. The bill in express words exempts those very men from service in the Army.

During the time of the Civil War 2,200,000 men marched to their hearts' desire to preserve the Union for $13 a month. The difference between the conference committee's bill and the proposal of the gentleman from Iowa is $5 a month. Is that $5 a month going to determine the question of whether the United States of America in the hour of trial shall have an army or shall not have an army? [Applause.] Is that difference of $5 a month going to determine whether the men in the United States will respond to the call of their country? If that is the case, then our vaunted patriotism has fallen low, indeed. I can not believe it to be so. I have a higher opinion of American patriotism, and I am confident the people of our country hold American patriotism on a higher plane.

What are the facts about this matter? The pay of a soldier under this bill will be $25 a month on his first enlistment. If he has subsequent enlistments he gets additional pay. If he is a private of the first class he gets $3 a month extra. For expert marksmanship he gets $5 additional. So that the privates of the first class who have a number of enlistments under this bill will get about $37 a month and over and 20 per cent additional if they get foreign service. They will get more than the New Zealander gets and they will get more than the Canadian gets. The Canadian does not get his pay of $33 a month except in the foreign service. The American who gets $25 a month under this bill, when he goes into the foreign service will get an increase of 20 per cent, or $30 a month, and that is all the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD] is contending for. The moment our private soldier puts his foot on the deck of a ship to go across the Atlantic, under the bill proposed by the conferees his pay will jump to $30 a month.

I submit to the House this proposition: When a bill goes to conference it is necessary for the conferees to give and take. The House conferees could not get everything that we wanted in the bill. We had to yield some things to the Senate. They wanted some things in the legislation just as earnestly as we did. This is a conference report agreed to after mature deliberation, after lengthy discussion on the part of the conferees of the two Houses, and I submit that under the circumstances the House should stand by the conferees. This bill has remained unacted upon for a long time. The country is growing impatient. Let us enact this into law. I feel confident that the pay of the soldiers as proposed in this bill will be satisfactory to the American people and the American soldier.

Mr. HELM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. HELM. Is it proposed by this motion to recommit to increase the pay of the soldier who never leaves the United States as well as the man who does?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. HELM. This increase in the pay of the man who goes to Europe may be justifiable, but unjustifiable in the case of the soldier who does not go abroad.

Mr. KAHN. Under the proposal every soldier in the United States, whether he has foreign service or not, will get an increase of $10 a month under the bill reported by the conferees.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from California has expired. The gentleman from Iowa has two minutes remaining and the gentleman from Alabama has four.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Speaker, I anticipated that the argument would be made that has been made upon the floor of this House appealing to the prejudice of men, appealing to you that the country is growing impatient. This bill passed the House Saturday afternoon and went to conference and the conferees never met until yesterday, and now they make the appeal that the country is growing impatient. So is this House, but our impatience is largely due to the violation of the instructions of the House by the conferees. [Applause.] You can adopt this amendment and the conferees can return inside of two hours with a bill doing simple justice to the enlisted man. [Applause.] Oh, the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] says the conferees had to give and take. I agree with that proposition. On this proposition the Senate fixed the pay of the private at $29 a month. The House unanimously fixed it at $30 a month, and if the conferees would give and take, they would have fixed the pay somewhere between the two, and yet they have fixed the pay at $25 a month in violation of the instructions of both Houses. [Applause.] There was no give and take; it was all take; it was to take from the pay of private soldiers of the United States. That was the "give-and-take" action of the conferees. [Applause.] Let us not make this the rich man's war and the poor man's fight. Let us do simple justice to-day. Mind you, my friends, when you go home and face the father and mother of the boy who has been drafted and say, "Yes, I voted to decrease his pay to $25 a month when I knew that the pay of the private soldier in Australia was $45 a month," how are you going to explain to that father and mother? Answer that question now by a patriotic vote on this motion to recommit. I beg of you to vote for this motion. [Applause.]

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, it is an absolutely unfair argument to make on the floor of this House that you will take men away from their families and leave them in a dependent condition under the present bill. The exemption clause in this bill provides expressly that those married men or even unmarried men who have dependent families shall be exempted from its operation.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENT. No; I can not.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Is that language in the bill?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. DENT. The law is so careful to take care of those people that it goes even one step further and provides that even the soldier now in service, whether he be in the Regular Army or in the National Guard, may be discharged if he has a family dependent upon him for support. So that we have absolutely taken care of dependent families in this country. I think that when gentlemen offered this proposition to increase the pay that they were not aware of the fact that there was on the statute books a law giving to a private soldier 20 per cent additional pay while on foreign service. That law has been on the statute book for years. This does not undertake to change it and, as has been stated, the lowest paid private soldier, if he goes upon foreign service, under the bill as agreed to in conference, will receive $30 per month. Now, something has been said here on the floor to the effect that the Senate voted an increase of $14 and the House an increase of $15 a month and the conferees went below both figures. The reason for that was that the Senate changed the figures in order that this matter might be sensibly worked out in conference, because we were told that even Members of the Senate who favored the amendment to increase this pay were not aware of the law that gave the private soldier an increase of 20 per cent when on foreign service. Now, what are we contending for here, Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House? You want the private soldier when he is actually engaged in foreign service to get $30 a month and this bill gives it to him. If you adopt this amendment, you give him $35 a month when $30 is all you have been asking for. We have tried to write a sensible bill and we have tried to follow the sentiment of this House as far as we could understand it, and for God's sake let us have a law before the House commits another somersault. [Applause.] We have done the very best we could in order to bring out a bill. We have even gone so far, after accepting your provision that this army should be raised by conscription first instead of by volunteers, as to graft upon the draft system the foolish proposition of allowing 80,000 men in the United States the peculiar privilege of volunteering. We have done that in order to carry out as far as we could the wishes of the House as has been expressed by its votes. Now, let us not again say to the country that we do not know our own minds about anything. Nobody raised this question when it was before the House last Saturday by any motion. It was sent back to conference, and for God's sake let us let the country know that we can take some sort of definite action. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The question is upon the motion of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD] to recommit the bill with instructions.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the motion to recommit be read again from the Clerk's desk, as there are some Members who did not hear it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that the motion to recommit may be again reported. Is there objection?

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky objects. The question is on the motion to recommit with instructions.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 199, nays 178, answered "present" 1, not voting 52, as follows:

Miss RANKIN. I desired to vote "yea."

The SPEAKER. Inasmuch as the lady was not in the Hall and listening when her name was called, she can not vote.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

On motion of Mr. GOOD, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was recommitted was laid on the table.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Waldorf, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had passed joint resolution of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. J. Res. 61. Joint resolution to grant authority for the erection of temporary buildings at the headquarters of the American Red Cross, Washington, D. C.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the motion to recommit the Army bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, we can not hear what is going on.

The SPEAKER. The House will be in order.

INCREASE OF MILITARY ESTABLISHMENT.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. DENT. That refers it back to the conferees?

The SPEAKER. Yes. You are now exactly where you were when you began. [Laughter.]

TEMPORARY BUILDINGS, RED CROSS.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take up House joint resolution 86, which proposes to authorize the American Red Cross to construct some temporary buildings to meet a present emergency. The report submitted with the resolution contains a letter from the Secretary of War.

Mr. MANN. Let the resolution be reported.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. SLAYDEN] asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of House joint resolution 86. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Joint resolution (H. J. Res. 86) to grant authority for the erection of temporary buildings at the headquarters of the American Red Cross, Washington, D. C.

Resolved, etc., That authority be, and is hereby, given to the Commission on Memorial to Women of the Civil War to grant permission, under such conditions and restrictions as it may deem necessary, to the central committee of the American Red Cross to erect upon square No. 172, in the city of Washington, a temporary building or buildings for the use of the American Red Cross in connection with its work in cooperation with the Government of the United States: Provided, That any building or buildings which may be erected under this authority shall be removed and the site or sites thereof placed in good condition within three years from the date of the approval of this resolution, unless otherwise especially provided by Congress: Provided further, That the United States shall be put to no expense of any kind by reason of the exercise of the authority hereby conferred.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. I reserve the right to object until the gentleman from Texas makes a statement.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Speaker, I will say to the gentleman, in explanation of the resolution, that the American Red Cross, at the request of the authorities, the War Department particularly, has undertaken the collection of a very large sum of money to provide supplies and means of relieving the distress of people both unconnected with the military service and in connection with it. They have necessarily enlarged the scope of their operations and increased the number of their employees, and there is no room in this big and beautiful building that has just been completed to house them. They ask the privilege of erecting on the same block—and the ground and building both belong to the United States—in the rear of the present building, a temporary one, and that it be permitted to remain, if necessary, for three years.

Mr. MANN. This is on the land occupied by the Red Cross Building, the title to which belongs to the United States?

Mr. SLAYDEN. Yes. It belongs to the United States. It is on the same block with the other building.

Mr. MANN. I make no objection.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SLAYDEN. Yes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Is there any provision, or should there be any, to the effect that the plans for this building should be approved by the Secretary of War or the Superintendent of Public Buildings and Grounds?

Mr. SLAYDEN. I do not think there is. It is to be only a temporary structure. As a matter of fact they have conferred with the Superintendent of Public Buildings and Grounds; yes.

Now, Mr. Speaker, all objection having been withdrawn, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the Senate joint resolution 61, which passed this morning, and which is identical with this, and pass it in lieu of the House resolution.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to take Senate joint resolution 61, of identical tenor, and consider that instead of the House resolution. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Joint resolution (S. J. Res. 61) to grant authority for the erection of temporary buildings at the headquarters of the American Red Cross, Washington, D. C.

Resolved, etc., That authority be, and is hereby, given to the Commission on Memorial to Women of the Civil War to grant permission, under such conditions and restrictions as it may deem necessary, to the central committee of the American Red Cross to erect upon square No. 172, in the City of Washington, a temporary building or buildings for the use of the American Red Cross in connection with its work in cooperation with the Government of the United States: Provided, That any building or buildings which may be erected under this authority shall be removed and the site or sites thereof placed in good condition within three years from the date of the approval of this resolution, unless otherwise especially provided by Congress: Provided further, That the United States shall be put to no expense of any kind by reason of the exercise of the authority hereby conferred.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the third reading of the Senate joint resolution.

The Senate joint resolution was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, House joint resolution 86, of similar tenor, will be laid on the table.

There was no objection.

On motion of Mr. SLAYDEN, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the Senate joint resolution was passed was laid on the table.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. RAKER rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from California rise?

Mr. RAKER. I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on House bill 3331.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, my memory is not sufficiently accurate to identify that bill by number. What is it about?

Mr. RAKER. This bill is for the purpose of relieving the placer-mining claimants from paying annual assessments, those who enlist in the present war; and, second, to relieve desert-land claimants who have made their filings and also have enlisted in the war. The Senate has passed a bill, and it is on the table, the same as the House bill, so far as the mining claimants are concerned, but it does not carry the provision relating to the desert-land claimants.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to print in the RECORD a resolution adopted at a patriotic mass meeting of the Slavic-American Patriotic League of the Mahoning Valley of Ohio.

Mr. MANN. What is the request?

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. There was a mass meeting held in my city last night by 25,000 Slavic-Americans, at which meeting they passed resolutions, and I ask unanimous consent to print them in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

WAR REVENUE.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 4280, the war-revenue bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. FOSTER in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. Before the adjournment last night the Clerk had read the first section of the bill.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

Page 2, at the end of line 3, insert:

"Provided, That on all net incomes between the stated amounts of exemption as now provided by law and those provided by section 3 hereof the normal tax shall be 2 per cent per annum.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, has the Clerk read to that point on page 2?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I take it from the discussion on the floor that it is the intention of the framers of the bill to levy a normal tax of 2 per cent on net incomes between the present exemptions of $3,000 and $4,000, respectively, and the proposed exemptions in the bill of $1,000 and $2,000, respectively. As I read this bill and read it carefully, the normal tax, if this amendment is not adopted, will be 4 per cent on all net incomes above $1,000 and $2,000, respectively. [Cries of "No!" "No!"]

Mr. STAFFORD. I direct the attention of gentlemen who say "No!" "No!" to the phraseology of the bill. Section 1 provides—

That in addition to the normal tax imposed by subdivision (a) of section 1 of the act entitled "An act to increase the revenue, and for other purposes," approved September 8, 1916, there shall be levied, assessed, collected, and paid a like normal tax of 2 per cent upon the income of every individual received in the calendar year 1917 and every calendar year thereafter.

Now, I wish to direct the attention of the committee to section 1 of the act of September 8, 1916, which it is proposed to amend:

SECTION 1. (a) That there shall be levied, assessed, collected, and paid annually upon the entire net income received in the preceding calendar year from all sources by every individual, a citizen or resident of the United States, a tax of 2 per cent upon such income; and a like tax shall be levied, assessed, collected, and paid annually upon the entire net income received in the preceding calendar year from all sources within the United States by every individual a nonresident alien, including interest on bonds, notes, or other interest-bearing obligations of residents, corporate or otherwise.

Suppose this bill contained nothing more than the first section, I submit to any person here in this House that the normal tax would be 4 per cent. Now, I direct the attention of the committee to the exemption as found in section 3, and I wish to say to the committee that this question was presented at the Treasury Department this morning, when leading officials of the income-tax division took the view that the normal tax will be 4 per cent on all incomes above the changed exemptions. It is to cure that ambiguity, if ambiguity exists, that I offer this amendment.

The only section that would possibly make the normal tax 2 per cent instead of 4 per cent would be section 3, and what does section 3 provide? Read it as carefully as you will and there is nothing that states clearly that the tax shall be 2 per cent on the amount below the present exemption and the new amounts provided in this bill. I read section 3:

The taxes imposed by sections 1 and 2 of this act shall be computed, levied, assessed, collected, and paid upon the same basis and in the same manner as the similar taxes imposed by section 1 of such act of September 8, 1916, except that in the case of the tax imposed by section 1 of this act (a) the exemptions provided in section 7 of such act of September 8, 1916, shall be, respectively, $1,000 and $2,000, instead of $3,000 and $4,000—

And so forth.

In that section you change the minimum amount of the exemption, but you in no wise state that the normal tax shall be changed from 4 per cent or that the additional normal tax shall be 2 per cent, as provided in section 1; that it shall apply to the different amounts between the three and four thousand dollar exemption amounts, respectively, and the one and two thousand amounts, respectively.

To carry out the intention that has been stated time and time again on the floor of the House that it is the purpose to levy but 2 per cent on these amounts between the present exemptions and the lower exemptions as carried in this bill, you must specify that the additional normal tax of 2 per cent shall only apply to the amounts between these two respective stated exemptions.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I want to call the gentleman's attention to lines 18 to 25, on page 4, where it says:

The provisions requiring the normal tax of individuals to be deducted and withheld at the source of the income shall not apply to the new 2 per cent normal tax herein prescribed until on and after January 1, 1918.

Mr. STAFFORD. I have read that very closely, and yet it does not militate against what I have said.

Mr. LONGWORTH. It recites that the normal tax shall be 2 per cent.

Mr. STAFFORD. It says that the provision requiring the normal tax from individuals shall be deducted and withheld at the source of the income shall not apply to the new 2 per cent normal tax until after January 1, 1918, and thereafter shall apply only to incomes exceeding $3,000, as provided, and so forth.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Exactly.

Mr. STAFFORD. That merely states a method as to the return of the different amounts occasioned by the new exemption. That in no way controverts the position I take. I ask the gentleman, supposing only section 1 were a part of this bill, what would be the normal tax in the future upon all incomes?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Four per cent.

Mr. STAFFORD. What are the exemptions in section 3? The exemptions are one and two thousand dollars, and where do you in any way say that the normal tax shall be but 2 per cent on the difference between the present exempted amount of three and four thousand dollars and one and two thousand dollars? You can not get away from it, unless those who are going to construe the law are going to accept the statements made on the floor of the House. In the construction of legislative enactments it is only when there is patent ambiguity upon the face of a measure that they resort to reports upon bills or to discussions upon the floor of the House to construe them.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. LENROOT. Is not the exemption in the bill lowered only for the additional tax proposed—that is, this tax?

Mr. STAFFORD. But what is the tax? It is 4 per cent. You raise the normal tax from 2 to 4 per cent by section 1 of this bill. You amend the present existing law in that particular, and in section 3 you provide a different scale of exemptions, lowering the exemptions from four and three thousand dollars to two and one thousand dollars. Suppose in section 3 you wiped out all exemptions, then I ask the gentleman what would be the normal tax?

Mr. LENROOT. Four per cent.

Mr. STAFFORD. Then how are you going to get at the intention of the framers of the law that the tax of 2 per cent shall apply upon the difference between three and four thousand dollars and one and two thousand dollars?

Mr. LENROOT. But my question was whether section 3 did not reduce the exemptions only for the purpose of these additional exemptions?

Mr. STAFFORD. There is no language in section 3 that says that. It says that the exemption shall be reduced. Section 1 increases the normal tax from 2 to 4 per cent and section 3 says that the exemptions, instead of being three and four thousand dollars, respectively, shall be one and two thousand dollars, respectively. Therefore if the normal tax is 4 per cent you would pay 4 per cent on all amounts above one and two thousand dollars.

Mr. LENROOT. It says except in the case of the taxes imposed by section 1 the exemption shall be as follows. Is there any tax imposed by section 1 except 2 per cent? The other 2 per cent must refer to some other law.

Mr. STAFFORD. That is the very ambiguity I am trying to clear up. There is no question that there is an ambiguity, and I think it might well be argued that the normal tax is 4 per cent, and that it applies upon all amounts above one and two thousand dollars, respectively—except that in the case of the tax imposed by section 1 of this act (a) the exemptions provided in section 7 of such act—

And so forth, shall be so and so.

Section 1 provides 2 per cent not only on the amounts above one and two thousand dollars, respectively, but above three and four thousand dollars, respectively, up to $20,000. You can not escape it. It is ambiguous, and I think it should be cleared up, so that there can be no question about the construction of it.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman, if the chairman of the committee desires to be heard at this time, I will be glad to have him proceed, but if not I would like to take the floor now.

Mr. KITCHIN. I suggest that the gentleman proceed.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman, I have not the slightest doubt in regard to what this means. I think we actually intended to lay a normal tax of 4 per cent upon sums between $1,000 for a single man and $5,000, and between $2,000 for a married man and $5,000. I think that was just what the committee intended to do, and if this amendment be adopted it will destroy that whole feature of the bill. I voted for the bill with that understanding and expectation, that it did precisely that thing; and if anyone will read section 3 of the bill he will see distinctly that while the normal tax up to the 1st of January next is based upon the old exemption in the old act, that after the 1st of January it becomes 4 per cent for both the old law and this law. That is the only feature in which we have amended the old law. The chairman of the committee, the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN], shakes his head, but that has been my understanding of it from the start, and it is my understanding now, taking section 3 and section 1 and putting them together.

Mr. LONGWORTH. But the estimates as to the amount of revenue that this law will raise were based upon a 2 per cent rate upon incomes from one to three thousand dollars.

Mr. HILL. I can not help what the estimates were based upon.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I mean that was the understanding.

Mr. HILL. My understanding of it, and I think the understanding of the other members of the committee besides myself, was that this year the old exemption for the old law stands, up to January 1 next; but that next year the exemptions all become alike under the old law and under the new law, and I can not get any other conclusion from it if I take section 1 and section 3 and read them together. That is the way I would like to see it done.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HILL. Yes.

Mr. LENROOT. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY] the other day——

Mr. HILL. I heard him, and I stated to a gentleman sitting beside me at that time that that was not my understanding.

Mr. LENROOT. He put into the RECORD a table presumably prepared by the committee, or for its use, which was directly contrary to the interpretation the gentleman now gives.

Mr. HILL. I will ask the gentleman if he does not understand it as I do?

Mr. LENROOT. I do not.

Mr. HILL. That is the way I understand it, and evidently the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] understands it in that way, and for that reason has offered his amendment. I have that understanding, and I voted with my eyes wide open. The exemptions in England before the war were $750 and no exemptions for a married man beyond the $750. Prussia had $225; Austria, $113; Italy, $77; Netherlands, $260; and Switzerland, $130. We make it a thousand dollars for single men and $2,000 for married men for the additional tax, and after the 1st of January next we make it $1,000 for the single man and $2,000 for the married man for the old law, but the old law continues to apply at three thousand and four thousand dollars until next January.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HILL. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. Has the gentleman had his attention called to the report of the Ways and Means Committee on the bill in this particular?

Mr. HILL. No.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman permit me to read what the report says?

Mr. HILL. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. The committee report says:

This title proposes the levying of a normal tax of 2 per cent upon individuals having an income of $1,000 and not more than $3,000 if single and $2,000 and not more than $4,000 if married or the head of a family, and an additional normal tax of 2 per cent upon the net income of individuals having larger incomes—

And so forth.

Mr. HILL. Certainly. The report is not the bill, from which I have taken my construction.

Mr. MANN. I fully agree with the gentleman as to what the bill said.

Mr. HILL. And, then, does the gentleman think I am right?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. HILL. So do I. That is what the conferees passed on. I did not give much attention to the report; I had nothing to do with the writing of it, of course, and—well, I will not say any more.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. As the gentleman from Wisconsin said, I prepared the table that is found in the RECORD on page 2125. I compared that table of the estimate of taxes to be paid if this bill becomes effective and under its provisions with a table prepared by an expert in the Treasury Department. It was my understanding then and it is my desire now, and has been all the time since this matter was first considered, to tax only such incomes between the lower exemption and the exemption provided for in the old law at 2 per cent on normal taxes. I never heard any question other than that discussed by anybody in the committee at any time. That is the intention now. If the language of the bill as it is prepared is not clear, it ought to be made clear, but it is my understanding it is clear. I think that the gentleman from Wisconsin is wrong, but if he is right it ought to be made right in the bill. The gentleman thinks that the language is not plain. I never heard the question presented as Mr. HILL has presented it discussed by any member of the committee or anybody else until now. These figures which I have prepared and put in the RECORD show that it was the intention to put 2 per cent on the difference between one and three thousand dollars' exemption for single persons and 2 per cent on all incomes of married people above $2,000 and not in excess of $4,000, as now provided by law. Then the normal tax will apply and pay 4 per cent from that time both as to single persons and married persons. That was the intention of the committee, and I think we have it correct.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I can not see any room for doubt or for any other construction of the provision with reference to the normal tax than the construction placed upon it by the gentleman from Michigan and the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT]. I think that the gentleman from Wisconsin forgets that this bill levies an additional income tax in addition to the tax levied by the present income-tax law. I think that he forgets that the present income-tax law of September 8, 1916, is untouched by this bill. Now read:

SEC. 1. That in addition to the normal tax imposed by subdivision (a) of section 1 of the act entitled "An act to increase the revenue, and for other purposes," approved September 8, 1916, there shall be levied, assessed, collected, and paid a like normal tax of 2 per cent upon the income of every individual received in the calendar year 1917 and every calendar year thereafter.

The normal tax levied in this section has absolutely nothing to do with the 2 per cent normal tax levied in the act of September 8, 1916. The exemption allowed in the present law of $3,000 for a single and $4,000 for a married person or head of a family remains the same as therein provided for computing the normal tax under that act. Now, this proposed bill levies an additional 2 per cent normal tax, and provides in section 3 that the exemption allowed in computing this additional 2 per cent normal tax shall be $1,000 in the case of single persons and $2,000 in the case of married persons or heads of families.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield for a suggestion?

Mr. KITCHIN. I will.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The old law imposed no tax on those incomes.

Mr. KITCHIN. Exactly. This bill proposes that the exemptions allowed in computing the additional 2 per cent normal tax be reduced for single persons to $1,000 and for married persons to $2,000. The report clearly states that this bill proposes the levying of a normal tax of 2 per cent upon individuals having an income of $1,000 and not more than $3,000 if single and $2,000 and not more than $4,000 if married or the head of a family, and an additional normal tax of 2 per cent upon the net income of individuals having larger incomes and an additional tax of 2 per cent upon the net incomes of corporations, joint-stock companies or associations, and insurance companies. The tax levied in this bill is a new tax upon incomes of single persons from $1,000 up to $3,000, and of married persons from $2,000 up to $4,000.

Now, then, we add to the present normal tax upon incomes of single persons in excess of $3,000 and of married persons or heads of families in excess of $4,000 an additional 2 per cent normal.

Mr. MADDEN. I would like to ask a question right there.

Mr. KITCHIN. Go ahead.

Mr. MADDEN. I understood the gentleman to say we would have to make out two schedules.

Mr. KITCHIN. I said that, when you are construing this bill, it has nothing to do with the present law as far as the normal tax and exemptions are concerned. Before I get through I will show you clearly that you could not adopt language that would make it clearer. Section 1 I have just read. Section 2 levies certain additional taxes in addition to the additional taxes levied by the act of September 8, 1916. We call the taxes levied by this section "surtaxes." Now, then, section 3 tells you about the exemption and what is excepted. I call the gentleman's attention to that. It says:

The taxes imposed by sections 1 and 2 of this act—

Not of the act of September 8, 1916, but of this act—the present bill—

shall be computed, levied, assessed, collected, and paid upon the same basis and in the same manner as the similar taxes imposed by section 1 of such act of September 8, 1916—

If it stopped there, there would be some ground for his construction. But this tax was to be levied, computed, and assessed upon the basis and in the same manner as the act of September 8, 1916, with respect to exemption and everything else—

that in the case of the tax imposed by section 1 of this act—

And not this September 8, 1916, act—except that in the case of the tax imposed by section 1 of this act.

That is, the additional 2 per cent normal.

The exemptions provided in section 7 of such act of September 8, 1916, shall be, respectively, $1,000 and $2,000, instead of $3,000 and $4,000.

That is as clear as language could make it. It goes on to say in making returns for this normal tax you make returns of incomes of $1,000 or over. And when you withhold it at the source—and that was with respect to this new normal tax—withholding it at the source will be so-and-so. We could not make the language clearer. The tax proposed in this bill is an additional tax, and the act of September 8 stands in its strict integrity untouched.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. If the gentleman would yield, section 3, as I regard it, is only to be considered as furnishing an explanation of how the extra 2 per cent imposed by this statute shall be computed and assessed.

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Yes. So that everything that is in the section is simply in relation to the extra 2 per cent?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Therefore under that construction 2 per cent upon this exemption of $1,000 and $2,000, between that and the higher figures, is all that is imposed upon that portion of income under this section?

Mr. KITCHIN. Certainly. I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania if he sees any doubt in the construction? Is not the language as clear as it can be?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. I think the language is perfectly clear. When you read section 1 you see there is an additional tax of 2 per cent, and, as the chairman has stated, this is a supplementary law and not an amendment of the old law. And when you take section 3 it is simply giving you the method by which the computation under this law is to be made.

Mr. KITCHIN. Surely.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. And when you see that you are dealing only with the 2 per cent provided for in this law, then you get the true meaning of section 3.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. I will.

Mr. STAFFORD. Is the gentleman from Pennsylvania correct——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from North Carolina has expired.

Mr. STAFFORD. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from North Carolina be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. STAFFORD. Is the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAHAM] correct in his statement that section 3 merely applies to the additional normal tax provided by section 1, because section 3 in the very first line refers not only to section 1 but section 2 of this act?

Mr. KITCHIN. Of this bill.

Mr. STAFFORD. It is not merely limited to the different exemptions in the bill.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. It is limited to the taxes imposed in this new act.

Mr. STAFFORD. Oh, yes.

Mr. KITCHIN. Here is the plain proposition. Instead of incorporating the administrative features of the present law with reference to the collection and assessment of the income tax in this bill, we simply refer to them for the manner of assessing and collecting the income taxes levied in this bill.

Mr. SWITZER. What is the use of referring to $3,000 and $4,000 as you have in section 3? Does not that tend to confuse?

Mr. KITCHIN. Instead of $3,000 and $4,000 under the present existing law——

Mr. SWITZER. What is the necessity for doing it?

Mr. KITCHIN. There may not be any absolute necessity, but it makes it clearer.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. HILL. Do I understand, then, according to the opinion of the chairman of the committee, that after the 1st of January, 1918, a man in making up his return has two exemptions? For the first 2 per cent he has $3,000 and $4,000 and for the second he has $1,000 and $2,000?

Mr. TOWNER. He has the exemption of $1,000 for a single and $2,000 for a married person under this act.

Mr. HILL. I understand.

Mr. KITCHIN. And then under the present act you have an exemption of $3,000 for a single person and $4,000 for a married person or the head of a family?

Mr. HILL. And that goes on forever, as long as the law stands—two different exemptions under the two acts?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. HILL. I did not understand it that way at all. I thought we were changing the exemption.

Mr. KITCHIN. The only difference is $40. The exemption allowed a single man is reduced from $3,000 to $1,000. That leaves him $2,000 on which to pay this 2 per cent if he is an unmarried man, and if he is a married man now paying an income tax he will pay 2 per cent upon the difference between $2,000 and $4,000, and it is still $40.

Mr. HILL. I think the understanding of the country was the same as that which I had, that hereafter, after the 1st of January, there would be only $1,000 exemption for the single man and $2,000 for the married man or head of a family.

Mr. KITCHIN. The normal tax will be 4 per cent upon incomes of single persons in excess of $3,000 and upon incomes of married persons or heads of families in excess of $4,000 and 2 per cent upon incomes of single persons between $1,000 and $3,000 and upon incomes of married persons between $2,000 and $4,000. I have never heard it intimated in the Ways and Means Committee in the discussion of this subject at any time that the construction of these provisions or the desire of the committee was other than I have indicated, so far as the new normal tax is concerned.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from North Carolina has expired. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

Mr. CHANDLER of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. CHANDLER of Oklahoma: Page 2, line 2, after the word "received," insert "from and after the 1st day of June."

Mr. CHANDLER of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, the retroactive feature of this bill is not right. It is unjust and un-American, and I believe that every gentleman in this House knows it. I therefore deem it unnecessary to discuss the matter further.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oklahoma.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. That in addition to the additional tax imposed by subdivision (b) of section 1 of such act of September 8, 1916, there shall be levied, assessed, collected, and paid a like additional tax upon the income of every individual received in the calendar year 1917 and every calendar year thereafter, as follows:

One per centum per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $5,000 and does not exceed $7,500.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to strike out the word "one," in line 11, page 2, and insert the word "two."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY].

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. TOWNER. This is an amendment offered to a paragraph. Under the rule is it not the practice to read the entire section?

The CHAIRMAN. Let the Chair state to the gentleman from Iowa that the rule is that appropriation bills and revenue bills are always read by paragraphs.

Mr. TOWNER. That will be the rule in this case?

The CHAIRMAN. That will be the rule unless it is otherwise determined.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that we read the bill by sections.

Mr. MANN. That is impossible. I object.

Mr. KITCHIN. Very well.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BARKLEY. Does the Chairman's ruling preclude the offering of an amendment at the end of the section as a substitute for the section?

The CHAIRMAN. No.

Mr. BARKLEY. I was asking as to the construction to be placed upon what the Chair said.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks a substitute to a section would be in order after it is read.

Mr. MANN. If the Chair will permit me, under the practice under the rule, a substitute for a section can be offered after the first paragraph is read if the mover gives notice.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is correct about that.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. KEATING. Going on the theory that we were amending the bill by sections, I refrained from asking the attention of the Chair after the first paragraph was read. I have an amendment to strike out the paragraph and insert a new section. Did I understand the Chair to say that that would not be in order?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair holds that if a gentleman has an amendment to offer as a substitute for this section it would be in order, as the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] stated, after the paragraph had been read, to offer his amendment, and then give notice at that time, if that carried, that he would move to strike out all the other part of the section, so that the gentleman will still have the same right to offer it at the end of the section if he gets the recognition of the Chair.

Mr. KEATING. It would not be necessary, then, to vote on the substitute paragraph by paragraph?

The CHAIRMAN. No. That would be but one amendment. Of course, amendments are in order to the substitute.

Mr. KEATING. I serve notice that I will offer a substitute at the proper time.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. TOWNER. The gentleman from Illinois stated that a substitute might be offered to the first paragraph with notice that, if carried, a substitute would be offered for the succeeding paragraphs.

Mr. MANN. What I stated was that when the first paragraph of the bill is read you can offer a substitute for the bill or the section giving notice that if the substitute is agreed to you will move to strike out the other paragraphs or sections as read.

Mr. TOWNER. That is what I intended to state. This is my inquiry, Mr. Chairman. Some of us expect to offer, if we can, amendments to the amounts in each of these paragraphs. That is not offered as a substitute but as an amendment to the paragraph. Would it be in order to make the same announcement and arrangement in regard to the amendment to the first paragraph?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks not. When the paragraph is read, Members can offer an amendment. It is in order to offer an amendment to the original paragraph as read.

Mr. HOWARD. In other words, the Chair does not mean by his ruling to give any man a monopoly on offering all the amendments to this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair in what he said did not mean to convey the impression that anyone would have a preference over another in offering amendments.

Mr. HOWARD. I so understood the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, if this amendment should receive favorable consideration by the committee I should trust that, either through amendments offered by myself or other Members, similar changes would be made in each of the paragraphs following, increasing the one on line 14 to 3, the one on 17 to 4, and the one on 20 to 5, and thereafter an increase of 25 per cent of the percentages that are named for each group or classification.

I should not undertake to detain the committee by a statement as to the amount of the revenue which these changes would give in addition to that now expected to be raised by the bill as reported. But I think it is apparent to all thinking men that we are going to need to raise all the money that it is expected the bill will raise, or, in other words, about eighteen hundred million dollars.

I think it is also perfectly apparent to those who have followed the debate that there are a number of provisions in the bill that likely will not stand as reported and probably will go out of the bill.

Mr. KITCHIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes.

Mr. KITCHIN. Will the gentleman point out what provisions he thinks will go out?

Mr. SHERLEY. I do not think, for instance, that the provision in regard to the zone rate for newspapers is going to stay in the bill [applause], although I express only my judgment of the judgment of the membership.

Mr. KITCHIN. Is it the gentleman's object to supply by the 1 per cent increase the money that would be lost by these provisions going out?

Mr. SHERLEY. My idea is that we ought to raise all the money we can legitimately raise, having in mind the equities in dealing with such a big subject matter, from the income tax for this basic reason—the tax upon the incomes of men is not a tax that by any possibility can destroy the activities of men. [Applause.] A great deal of the criticism of the bill is that it may result in certain cases in totally destroying the particular business of the individual man. Therefore, I for one am desirous of raising as much money from the incomes of men as it is possible without doing an unfair thing.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. Certainly.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I am asking the gentleman for information, how high a rate on the highest income will there be according to the gentleman's plan; what would be the limit?

Mr. SHERLEY. When we get to the larger incomes I should be glad to see new subdivisions mentioned on page 4, lines 4 and 5, whereby you would tax with increased amount the incomes above a million dollars.

Mr. LONGWORTH. What would the gentleman say about changing the figures 33 applying to $500,000?

Mr. SHERLEY. I would have no objection to changing it to 40, but I would rather deal with that when we get to it.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I wanted to know how far the gentleman's suggestion went.

Mr. SHERLEY. I do not think there is any great harm going to come by excess taxes on incomes over $500,000 or $1,000,000. I am not very much concerned about the tragedy that will come to the lives of men whose incomes are of that size. And I do not say that with any idea of speaking against wealth. My 14 years' service here relieves me from any charge of demagogy or appealing to the poor at the expense of the rich.

I submit to the House that the rates we are proposing can be made higher without any great burden. Take the amendment I have offered of changing the tax from 1 per cent to 2 per cent on an income of $7,500. That would make a difference of $25. In other words, the man who receives an income of $7,500 pays an added tax of $25 on the $2,500 income between $5,000 and $7,500. If you make a rate of 2 per cent, you have increased his burden $25. I submit that that increase is not so heavy as to be a real burden on the very large number of people in America whose incomes are between $5,000 and $7,500.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kentucky has expired.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SHERLEY. That would take, for instance, such an amount from the income of all Members of Congress, and none of us will be hurt by an increase of $25 additional tax. When you get down to the next sum, you make it 3 per cent between incomes of $7,500 and $10,000. You have added $25 there, and so it runs. The big money that is going to be obtained by this taxation is going to come from two sources, the two ends. It is going to come from the increased number of people who will have to pay a tax by virtue of the reduction in the exemption, and also from the very large fortunes, judging by the returns that have been made in the income-tax law heretofore. But this intermediate group will give quite large additional sums without any real burden being placed upon anyone, and realizing that the country must raise by taxation the full amount that this bill carries I make this suggestion. I do not share in the slightest the viewpoint stated by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] touching the amount of expenditure that will have to be made by this Government, and I do not share the viewpoint of those who would undertake to postpone the proper financing of this war. It is not simply the question of putting the burden upon this generation and future generations, but it is this fundamental fact, that if you do not have proper taxation now you will have the greatest inflation of values that the world ever saw as the result of the tremendous amount of money that we are putting into the circulation of the country. [Applause.]

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes.

Mr. FERRIS. The gentleman from Kentucky stated a moment ago that it was his thought that he would offer increased rates all along down through. I wondered if he had that worked out mathematically, so that he could tell just how much it would increase.

Mr. SHERLEY. I unfortunately have not, and perhaps may be negligent in that, but if I had it would simply be a guess, and a guess similar to the guess the committee makes touching revenues that would be raised here. I do not say that in any disrespect to the committee, but it is impossible for anyone to anticipate the exact amount of revenue that will be obtained from these rates. Oh, yes; we can estimate, and that is the only thing that we now need to be concerned about, inasmuch as these are proposals for increase and not for decrease, and it is a question of whether the particular burden placed upon each man by virtue of these increases is an unfair burden.

I submit to the common sense and judgment of every man here that asking $25 additional money from a man who has an income of from $5,000 to $7,000, $500 is not a burden that he is going to feel in any great sense.

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes.

Mr. McCORMICK. I was called from the Chamber for a moment. Has the gentleman suggested to what extent he would increase the tax upon incomes exceeding $500,000 a year, incomes of a million a year and five million and thirty million a year?

Mr. SHERLEY. I only roughly suggested it. I would certainly be willing to take half of all the incomes that are above the amount the gentleman has named.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That is done here.

Mr. SHERLEY. Oh, no. The present rate does not do anything of the kind. The present rate fixes upon the basis of somewhere about 40 per cent, and why? Because the 33 per cent applies only to the income that is above $500,000. The 30 per cent applies only to the income above $300,000 and up to $500,000, and so it averages all the way down, and you can not add the 17 per cent of income under existing law to the 33 per cent proposed by the new law and make 50 per cent as representing the 50 per cent upon the entire income of the man. It will not work out in that way. It will work out much less than that, and while I have not worked out accurately what it is, I am informed that it is somewhere about 40 per cent on incomes of a million dollars and it is less, of course, on incomes less than that.

Mr. McCORMICK. Will the gentleman suggest why an income of $5,000,000 should pay 50 per cent?

Mr. SHERLEY. I would be perfectly willing to tax an income of $5,000,000 50 per cent, and I do not think the man would be injured by virtue of it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kentucky has again expired.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I will ask for two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SHERLEY. I do not desire to punish men of wealth, but every man who has thought at all and who has a conscience knows that taxation is not fair that is simply levied upon a mathematical basis, and that the true rule of taxation is the ability to bear. [Applause.] In other words, the strong should bear proportionately a larger amount than the weak, and if civilization means anything it means the dominance of that thought, as compared with the old thought of purely mathematical equality, which was equality only in mathematics and not in actualities. Therefore I believe that this Congress, not in a spirit of spite, not with a desire to punish men, but as thinking men, realizing something of the burdens of life—we will never, unfortunately, in this world have wisdom enough to do exact justice—ought to endeavor to approximate it, and we can afford to put burdens upon income without destroying industry. The danger that we are under here, in the desire to get revenue, is that by taxing industry you may kill the industry from which you expect to get the revenue, and a tax on incomes can not produce that effect.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I am not defending this particular item. I favor putting the tax on the higher fortunes, but this bill provides that a tax of 33 per cent shall be put on incomes above $500,000, in addition to what is provided for in the act of September 8, 1916, which is 10 per cent, which makes 43 per cent, which, plus the 4 per cent normal tax, makes 47 per cent upon incomes of $500,000 and over.

Mr. SHERLEY. Well, but it does not work out that way. I can not help it; the gentleman can read statutes until doomsday, but the mistake he is making is in assuming that the maximum tax applies to the entire income, whereas it only applies to incomes over a certain amount, and when your average is shown you will find the amount is very much less than the total maximum tax.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Chairman, I will ask that the Clerk read the following amendment in my time.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 2, beginning at line 4, strike out everything down to and including line 5, on page 4, and insert the following:

"SEC. 2. That in addition to the normal tax provided for in section 1 of this act and by subdivision (A) of section 1 of the act entitled 'An act to increase the revenue, and for other purposes,' approved September 8, 1916, there shall be levied, assessed, collected, and paid in lieu of the additional tax now provided by law an additional tax upon the income of every individual received in the calendar year 1917, and every calendar year thereafter, as follows: Two per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $5,000 and does not exceed $7,500; 4 per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $7,500 and does not exceed $10,000; 8 per cent per annum upon the amount by which such total net income exceeds $10,000 but does not exceed $20,000; 13 per cent per annum upon the amount by which such total net income exceeds $20,000 but does not exceed $40,000; 18 per cent per annum upon the amount by which such total net income exceeds $40,000 but does not exceed $60,000; 28 per cent per annum upon the amount by which such total net income exceeds $60,000 but does not exceed $80,000; 38 per cent per annum upon the amount by which such total net income exceeds $80,000 but does not exceed $100,000; 48 per cent per annum upon the amount by which such total net income exceeds $100,000 but does not exceed $150,000; 96 per cent per annum upon the amount by which such total net income exceeds $150,000."

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. SHERLEY. Is it in order to submit such an amendment until the section has been read by paragraphs for amendment?

Mr. KEATING. It is being read in my time.

Mr. SHERLEY. I beg the gentleman's pardon.

Mr. KEATING. When we have concluded the consideration of this section I will move to strike out the entire section and insert the amendment which has been read. The effect of the new section will be to tax all incomes above $150,000, 100 per cent. A man who had an income of $150,000 would be taxed 33⅓ per cent and he would have left a net income of $100,000, but no one in the Republic would have an income in excess of $100,000.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEATING. I do.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. After $100,000 all else would be confiscated?

Mr. KEATING. It would be taxed. I presume when you take money for taxes you confiscate.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. It would be conscripted, as it were?

Mr. KEATING. Exactly that.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. May I ask if the basis of the plan submitted by the gentleman is that submitted by the association of which Mr. Pinchot is the head?

Mr. KEATING. This is substantially that plan, somewhat changed to meet the requirements of this bill. Now, Mr. Chairman, this amendment will produce between $1,600,000,000 and $1,700,000,000 per year. It will produce that sum of money without oppressing any man, without laying an unreasonable burden upon any industry. It would be a tax levied without regard to a man's occupation and without regard to the business in which he engaged.

Let us consider the objections to the amendment. First, it is urged that the amendment is too radical; that it is too drastic. The fact is that the bill now before the House, recommended by the Committee on Ways and Means, is the really radical bill, because that is a bill that we are assured by hundreds of business men will destroy their business.

Only yesterday the newspapers were filled with reports of the testimony submitted to the Senate Committee on Finance by business men who, testifying under oath, said that if the bill now under consideration is enacted into law they will be driven out of business. The man who advocates legislation which wrecks industry is not only a radical but an anarchist. My amendment will produce the money and no man will be driven out of business.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEATING. I can not yield just now. I think we should lay down in considering this legislation some rule that would guide us in the future. I think I can state an accurate rule in a sentence and that is: "A man's obligation to contribute to the support of government at this time is dependent upon his ability to pay."

I was not in favor of conscriptive selection when it had to do with flesh and blood, when it had to do with the things that God makes, but I am in favor of selective conscription when it has to do with machinery, with clothing, with food, with money, with the things that men make. [Applause.] My proposition applies this principle of selective conscription to the problem of raising the money needed to support this Government in time of war. We say to a man who is drawing a salary of $2,000, "The Government recognizes that you are already taxed in the increase in the cost of living. The Government recognizes that the cost of the necessities of life in your case has increased 100 per cent, and that your salary of $2,000 has within the last three years been reduced one-half in purchasing power. Therefore we will deal leniently with you."

Mr. MEEKER. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. KEATING. I can not just now.

Mr. MEEKER. I would like to ask the gentleman one question right here.

Mr. KEATING. All right.

Mr. MEEKER. What effect would this have on the floating of the loan, on men's purchasing power, if we were to put such a provision in? We are expecting some men to take these bonds by the millions. How would this affect that?

Mr. KEATING. I will answer that now. I had intended to come to it. The argument is that you are about to discourage millionaires from making investments. Well, my friend, if you pass my amendment, we will take the millionaire's money; we will take his excess profits, and we will invest it, because Uncle Sam is not going to put this money in a strong box and permit it to remain there. Uncle Sam will take it and invest it in those things that are necessary in order to maintain an army in the field. If you adopt my amendment, it will not be necessary for you to enact further bond bills or to appeal to millionaires to purchase bonds. The object of this amendment is to take the excess profits and the excess incomes from the rich of this country and use that money to pay the running expenses of the Government.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEATING. Yes.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Will the gentleman permit me to call his attention to the fact that the bond incomes are exempted from income taxes, and therefore that the effect of such an amendment as the gentleman proposes will be to encourage millionaires to buy the bonds?

Mr. KEATING. I presume there is a little something to that argument, but I do not anticipate that the millionaires of this country are going to rush to the Treasury of the United States and invest their money in Government bonds. I do not think the millionaires of this country are going to rush out of this country and invest their money elsewhere. If they leave the United States and seek to invest it elsewhere, where will they go? Will these "patriotic" millionaires take their money and go to Mexico and subject themselves and their belongings to the more spectacular and more effective income tax which is assessed by Señor Villa and Señor Carranza? No; my friends. There is nothing to this theory that the millionaires will leave this country and take their money elsewhere and invest it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Colorado has expired.

Mr. KEATING. May I have five minutes more?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Colorado asks unanimous consent for five minutes more. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. SWITZER. How much do you estimate we will raise? What is the estimated amount?

Mr. KEATING. The estimates made upon this amendment have been gone over with some care by experts, and it is their judgment that with this amendment the income-tax returns will be somewhere between $1,600,000,000 and $1,700,000,000.

Mr. SWITZER. How about the succeeding years? Will it hold up?

Mr. KEATING. I have no doubt it will; none whatever. Some gentlemen question that. But why not? These men will go on with their business until the war ends, and at the end of the war they will have an opportunity to once more enjoy their profits, as these taxes will be taken off the statute books. You can not tell me, gentlemen, that the rich men affected by the income tax will attempt to disarrange the entire business structure of this country. It will not be done.

And, then, I have some confidence in the patriotism of the rich men of this country. I witnessed a twentieth-century miracle the other day, something that has never been seen in the Halls of Congress before. I saw three millionaires—real millionaires; not stage millionaires—going into the Committee on Ways and Means and asking that this very amendment be enacted into law. [Applause.] And I want to place their names in the RECORD so that those who are interested may know that we have rich men in this country who in the hour of their country's need were willing not only to give their lives but their money for the support of the Government.

The committee was headed by Amos Pinchot, a pacifist, if you please [applause], the kind of pacifist who during the Spanish-American War served in the Volunteer Army, and when they offered him a commission, although he was the son of a millionaire and of a family that was strong in the councils of the Republican Party, declined to take a commission, but served his country as a private.

E. W. Scripps, a newspaper man, who is not a pacifist, came to this country a poor boy and has built up a great business. He owns some 30 or 40 newspapers throughout the country, and now in his old age he has wired the President of the United States that, so far as he is concerned, he is willing that all incomes above $50,000 should be taken for the support of the Government. And then there was Sumner Gerard, a young man of wealth from New York, brother of the former ambassador to Germany. And these three gentlemen represented a number of rich men who were willing that this kind of an amendment should be written into the law.

Now, what will be the effect of the adoption of this amendment? You can get rid of all of these annoying taxes that business men have been protesting against. You can abolish the taxes on the necessaries of life. You can wipe out this iniquitous and unscientific tariff provision which has been inserted into this bill, and, more important than all, you can prevent the liquor business riveting itself with rivets of gold onto the Government of the United States during the period of the war. [Applause.]

Mr. BLAND. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Colorado yield to the gentleman from Indiana?

Mr. KEATING. I can not yield just now.

My friends, I opposed this war. I opposed it by voice and vote. I opposed conscription. But now that my country has decided to go to war, I want my country to go to war in the most effective fashion. I want my country to have all the men and all the ships and all the money that it needs, and, above all, I want my country to go to war sober. I do not want it to be said that when the greatest Republic in the world went to war it had to finance its Army with a tax on the liquor business. Before this war is over this country will be dry, and the only place where you can get the money with which to supply the deficit in your revenues is by increasing your income tax.

And so I ask this House in all seriousness to adopt this amendment, which will leave to every man who is affected by the tax ample with which to care for himself and for those who are dependent upon him, and which will not in the slightest degree oppress any business in this country.

I thank you. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I desire to incorporate as a part of my remarks, the following statement presented to the Senate Finance Committee by Mr. Amos Pinchot on behalf of the American Committee on War Finance:

Senator SIMMONS and gentlemen, I represent the American Committee on War Finance. Our object is to get you gentlemen to have this war paid for as it goes along largely by a tax on surplus incomes.

This committee is, as you know, a recent organization. It was formed just before war was declared. We issued a declaration of principles and a pledge, advertised a little in the newspapers, and wrote letters to some prominent people. In a few days we got together a group, including lawyers, editors, writers, civic and business men's associations, labor and farm organizations and leaders, a governor of the Federal Reserve Board bank, the chairman of the New York civil-service commission, and so on. To-day, I think I am well within the fact when I say that the organizations which have already passed resolutions indorsing our plan and offering cooperation and support contain several million people.

Since our committee was formed we have had each day an enormous mail, letters from prominent people and people less prominent, from all over the country. They have expressed their belief that the war can not be either justly or efficiently carried on unless people who do not fight but have plenty of money are made to realize their responsibility and forced to give to the Government the use of their wealth, at least to the extent of a heavy tax on large incomes.

We have had little organization; the main work of the committee has been conducted from my office at 60 Broadway, New York City. Our funds have been very limited, as we have found, strange as it may appear, that most rich people are not enthusiastic about backing a project that means heavier taxation on themselves. Yet we have had an overwhelming response, and, if we have another month to work in, I believe we will get to indorse our demand upon you gentlemen for equitable financing of this war all the labor and farm organizations in the country, three-fourths of the civic and business associations; in fact, the demand for a pay-as-you-go war, financed by the people who can do so without great sacrifice, will become not merely what it is now, a broad national demand, but a literally universal one. The people, Mr. Chairman, are solidly behind the movement.

In the last few days we have had resolutions from business, political, and labor organizations, composed of some 500,000 people of good standing. I refer particularly to the resolutions of the four railroad brotherhoods passed on Saturday afternoon, and to those of the city council of Cleveland, Ohio, and to a large number of scattered industrial unions that have sent us the record of their indorsement.

Mr. Chairman, I want to protest quite vigorously against some of the tariff taxation contained in the Ways and Means Committee bill. The ordinary people of the United States are not in a position to be further taxed. They should not be further taxed, and they can not be without their feeling dissatisfied with the Government and especially with this Congress.

Let me show you what I mean. In 1914 I had made for me by statisticians in New York and Washington a comparison between the incomes of ordinary people and the cost of living from 1900 to 1914. I found that in that time incomes—I mean by this wages, salaries, the earnings of small people—had gone up about 27 per cent. The cost of living, figured out in food, fuel, clothing, rent, and household utensils, had gone up in the same year about 40 per cent. In other words, from 1900 up to the outbreak of the war, the average man's income was certainly increasing; but, nothwithstanding this fact, he was actually growing poorer. He received more money for his work or from his business or for his services, but with that money he could buy less of the necessaries of life.

This, Mr. Chairman, is not a matter of speculation. It is a matter of mathematical certainty. Not long ago I was talking with the general counsel of one of our very large industrial corporations. I told him about my investigation of wages and the cost of living, and asked him what he thought about it. He told me that he had just completed a survey of wages and cost of living among his thousands of employees for the last 10 years. He said the result of his survey was precisely the same as the one my statisticians had arrived at. He said that his employees, though they did not realize it themselves on account of getting a fatter pay envelop, had grown steadily poorer in purchasing power and were still growing poorer.

Since the war this situation has grown acute. The cost of living has gone up much faster than ever before. No doubt it will go on going up. Since the war the average man's expense account has still more rapidly outstripped his earning power. Increases in wages and small incomes have been insignificant compared to the rise in prices. That is why our committee protests against the House bill, which intends to raise a thousand millions of dollars this year from taxes taken out of the pocket of the consumer. I will refer you later to figures which prove in detail what I have said generally.

Mr. Chairman, something is happening in the United States that can not help having a serious influence upon the country. While the country is getting rich the people are getting poor. The average American is steadily losing his purchasing power. In other words, wealth is being concentrated in the hands of a comparatively few rich people. In other words again, the great genius and energy of the Nation has not during the last few years benefited the average citizen. We have had a class as opposed to a popular prosperity.

We have got to face this. You have got to face it. You ought to face it now, when you are making up your budget to raise money to carry on the war. The people of the United States have become informed on this subject, and they know what they are up against. They want you as their representatives to help them out.

The revenue bill which you are considering does not seem to me to be a measure representing the necessities of the situation. There is no reason for burdening the consumer, who is already overburdened. It is estimated that the income tax in Great Britain will yield at least $1,000,000,000, which is about $750,000,000 more than it yielded before the war. In the year ending March 31, 1916, the huge sum of £295,033,000 was raised by income taxes. Your bill only intends to raise $532,000,000 in new income taxes. It is estimated that the British excess-profits tax will yield $700,000,000 this year. You only intend to raise $200,000,000 in that way. The population of Great Britain is about 46,000,000; its total wealth, including Ireland, is about $85,000,000,000. Our population is 100,000,000 and our total wealth is estimated from $187,000,000,000 to $230,000,000,000. Certainly it seems as if we ought to be able to raise as much by an income tax, when we are strong and unexhausted, as England can in the third year of the war.

It is true that England does not tax her largest incomes adequately, although through the profits tax and income tax together the percentage is far higher than anything contemplated in the House bill. But England distinguishes between earned and unearned incomes, and taxes the latter very heavily. She also taxes medium incomes much more than the House bill provides, which I think is unwise.

It seems to me that the House bill is undemocratic, unjust to the poor, and unbusinesslike. It bears on the wrong man, discourages the people who must fight the war, and it throws barbed wire into the business machine and taxes it at the wrong end. If Great Britain can raise $1,000,000,000 from incomes without disturbing business, the United States ought to be able to raise $1,500,000,000 or $2,000,000,000 in that way without disturbing business. If Great Britain can put on a $700,000,000 excess-profits tax without disturbing business, we ought to be able to put on a $1,400,000,000 excess-profits tax without disturbing business. What is the matter with American business that it should be disturbed so much more easily than British business by income and profits taxes? And, on the other hand, why should we impose on American business an unscientific and haphazard horizontal increase in the raw materials that industry uses?

Mr. CLAUDE KITCHIN, chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, confessed that he would vote for the revenue bill with his eyes shut, and that the horizontal increase of 10 per cent on imports, already paying a tariff tax, and on all articles now on the free list, was unscientific and indefensible.

Before the revenue bill becomes a law there should be ability enough in the House and the Senate to make it scientific and defensible, for it will have to be defended on the stump by those who impose this tax in their effort to secure reelection from those upon whom its burden falls.

Evidently the Ways and Means Committee underestimates the patriotism of the business men of the country in considering them unwilling to pay heavy income taxes. It is true the protests have been most bitter at the unscientific tinkering with present productive enterprises, especially in this horizontal increase of tariff rates, including taxes on raw materials. But in my opinion the patriotic business men of the country are willing to contribute heavily from profits and incomes, as long as his productive energies are allowed to function properly. He is willing to be milked if you don't kill the cow.

Take the single item of a 10 per cent tax on hides now on the free list. Shoe manufacturers contend that this will produce a comparatively small revenue for the Government, while enabling the Beef Trust to raise their prices on hides automatically 10 per cent; and that the export-shoe business will be brought to an end, thus crippling an enterprise which would produce large revenues directly to the Government through taxes on incomes and excess profits. At the other end of the line the consumer, who is already paying in the neighborhood of 100 per cent more for shoes, must add not only the 10 per cent increase on hides but an additional increment of taxation for every stage of handling between the manufacturer and the consumer.

The 3 per cent increase in freight rates again automatically makes a readjustment of all business contracts necessary, and, by the time the increase reaches the consumer, it will have multiplied itself several times, thus making a horizontal raising of the cost of living, already mountain high. Again, a 10 per cent tax on passenger rates will, of course, be felt by the man who has to travel for business or chooses to do so for pleasure; but it means a tremendous increase in the expenses of the business man with drummers upon the road.

The same thing is true in the increase in postal rates. To increase the cost of sending letters one-third, when everyone knows that the 2-cent postage on letters already more than pays the cost of distribution, tends again to decrease production.

It is to be hoped that the House, through independent action, or if the House should weakly consent to pass the compromise measure because it received a unanimous report from the Ways and Means Committee, that the Senate will lift the burden of taxation from consumption and place it upon large incomes and profits.

A curious plexus of circumstances lies immediately before us, Mr. Chairman. The public is going to be subjected to conscription. We are going to confiscate the lives of our young men for this war, and at the same time that this confiscation goes on, the public is going to be pinched by poverty, probably by hunger in the near future. We are up against a very serious crisis that demands extraordinarily careful and wise action.

The poor man who goes to the front is not going to be happy or easy in his mind, if he realizes that the rich man, who is too old to fight or in a position so important that he will not be asked to fight, is only going to make a mighty small and insignificant sacrifice. Mr. Chairman, it is more for a man to give his life than it is to give all his money, capital as well as interest. It is more for a man with a family to give $40 from his $3,000 income than it is for a man with a million dollars a year to give all of that million dollars and some of his capital to boot. Why? Because when the $3,000-a-year man gives some of his income, he gives the meat and bread, the shoes and clothes of his children, the coal and rent, his wife's dress, the movie show, and the little luxury that makes life a little less hard on him and those he loves. But the millionaire does not have to give those things, not even if you split his fortune in two. Mr. REAVIS put it well, debating the bill in the House last week. He said:

"You are taking a great deal, so far as actual dollars and cents are concerned, but in the proportionate sacrifice that the men who pay it will make, you are taking a great deal more from the married man with $2,000 who has a family to support than you are from the $10,000,000 man.

"The man with an income of $2,000 whom you tax has to pay this tax from the very necessities of life, while the man with the income of $10,000,000 is paying that income out of funds that he can use only in the way of investment. The relative sacrifice is not to be compared."

Mr. Chairman, I think that we are inclined to underestimate the determination of the people to have this war justly financed. I also think you overestimate the opposition that a real income and a real excess-profits tax would develop on the part of rich people. Rich people will soon realize, if they have not already, that we are in war and that war is neither a tea party nor a director's meeting. They will see men and boys go to the front to die, and they will be ashamed of ever having had a thought or a wish to oppose giving every cent they can raise to back up those men and boys. They will see women and children starving in the next year, and men too. And they will have to go the whole way in giving their money to fight war abroad and suffering at home. They should and must be taxed to pay for the war simply because they have money, and can part with a lot of it without acute physical or mental suffering. God knows the sacrifice of those of us who have money will be trivial enough, when compared with that of the vast majority of the public, who will do the fighting, make the supplies, raise the food, and be the nation's backbone until the war is over and afterwards. They are the people that this bill should consider. They are the people that this Government, in all its branches, should represent. They are the people, in fact, who maintain the Government; and we must remember that they do not maintain it for the purpose of being governed by it, but in order to govern themselves through it.

Lastly, Mr. Chairman, I would like to call your attention to the fact that extreme poverty, caused by the war, joining with the additional rise in the cost of living which this bill will bring about, will precipitate a situation where the proceeds from taxation on the consumer may seriously disappoint you. The House bill may not raise a thousand millions or anything like it. People won't spend money unless they have it. They won't spend it to buy things at prohibitive prices. But you can always tax the people who have money. Their incomes are a sure and safe source of war revenue. England has learned this. We will learn it. Why not learn it now?

The fact is that we have been rather extravagant here in America. Our people have maintained, apparently for social or ornamental purposes, a very large number of multimillionaires. This past year, according to tax returns, there were twice as many people with an income of over a million dollars a year as there were the year before.

Two per cent of the people in the United States own 65 per cent of the wealth. But of those who will fight in this war probably much less than one in a hundred will be men of means. For less than one-half of 1 per cent of our people have, up to date, been rich enough to pay an income tax. If our wealthy classes are to make a substantial contribution, it must be through paying very large income and profit taxes.

WAR PRICES AND INCOMES.

Index figures published in the April Review of the United States Bureau of Labor Statistics indicate that, even in the field of organized labor, there has not been a large raise in wages compared to the raise in the cost of living. The Review says:

"The index numbers appear in the following table, where it will be seen that while wage rates have increased materially and hours of labor have slightly decreased since 1907, the retail prices of food have advanced to a much greater extent, especially in 1916, thus reducing the purchasing power of wages."

In the general field of organized labor, between 1912 and 1917, an estimate that wages had increased 18 per cent would be an extravagant one. I have found no estimate as high as that. The Review of Labor Statistics for April, 1917, says that wages increased 9 points from 1912 to 1916, while retail food prices went up 20 points. As to the incomes of professional people, teachers, clerks, shopkeepers, farmers, and so on, I could not get any broad or definite statistics; there are none. But from such as there are and from talking with them, it seems pretty evident that there has been a fairly small increase in their incomes in the last few years. Since I have been working on the Committee on War Finance, we have had numberless letters from teachers, professors in universities, and men and women in salaried positions, small business men, stating that they have practically had no increase in income during the last few years, and that being taxed to pay for the war will be a very serious hardship.

Let us look at the other side of the shield and see how the cost of living has gone up.

War conditions and war prices have already placed the average American in a financial condition where he can not decently be asked to pay for the war.

The New York Times Annalist, of April 23, 1917, publishes a table showing "index numbers" of the increase in the cost of living in the last two years. It explains the table as follows: "The Annalist index number shows the fluctuations in the average wholesale price of 25 food commodities selected and arranged to represent a theoretical family's food budget." Here are the figures:

For April 24, 1915, index number is 154.
For April 22, 1916, index number is 166.
For April 21, 1917, index number is 270.

In other words, the 25 most common and necessary articles of family use have almost doubled in price in the last two years.

Dun's index figures show similar price increases, as follows: Between April 1, 1914, and April 1, 1917, dairy and garden products increased 84 per cent; meat, 46 per cent; clothing, 49 per cent; metals, 69 per cent; and foodstuffs, 105 per cent.

A few days ago the Old Dutch Market (Inc.), of Washington, D. C., which operates a large string of stores, selling meats, canned goods, eggs, vegetables, etc., published a comparison of prices in April, 1914, and April, 1917. It deals in all with 60 table necessaries. The average increase on all items listed is 85.32 per cent during that period.

As a corollary to this we have the report issued on April 26 of the food committee appointed by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia. "Interesting figures were obtained," says the committee, "from the proprietors of some of the smaller stores, whose business is with the poorer people. They show clearly that the poor have been compelled to resort to the strictest economy in order to provide food, on account of high prices. The purchases are of the cheapest possible articles and in smaller quantities than heretofore. The sale of ordinary cuts of meat in this class of stores seems to have been discontinued, and the meat now purchased consists of hog livers, hog kidneys, neck bones, hog faces, etc."

Following the food riots in New York, Miss Helen M. Todd was appointed to make an investigation of the effect on school children of the high cost of food. She reported last week that in the poorer districts diet has been so cut down that the children's scholarship has suffered materially through malnutrition, and that public-school teachers complain that the children are unable to maintain their grades.

The Review of the United States Bureau of Labor Statistics, for April, 1917, tells the same story. In the four years from February 15, 1913, to February 15, 1917, flour increased in price 69 per cent, eggs 61 per cent, potatoes 224 per cent. A 16-ounce loaf of bread cost, on February 15, 1914, $0.055; on February 15, 1915, $0.062; on February 15, 1916, $0.062; and on February 15, 1917, $0.071. Bread to-day is 10 cents a loaf. As this goes to press wheat is $3 a bushel in the western markets.

As to coal, the Black Diamond Magazine and the Coal Trade Journal show that the average retail price of anthracite range coal in New York was $5 a ton in January, 1915, and $8.75 a ton in January, 1917. Soft coal at the mines was from $0.80 to $1.65 a ton in December, 1914, and from $4.75 to $6.50 a ton in January, 1917; this in the face of yearly increasing output.

Take one particular item, shoes. I could give you quite definite statistics on shoes. I will quote from the Shoe Retailer, the leading periodical of the shoe trade. Its issue of March 24 contains a symposium on the subject from leading manufacturers throughout the country. I will hand in a copy of excerpts from it. Mr. James Coward, of the great retail store of New York, says, "A staple shoe that we sold at $3.95 two years ago sells to-day for $6.50." Mr. Coward said that the increase in price within the next year would be even greater and would begin to climb at once. He said that kid skin that sold a year ago for 32 cents a foot now sells at 80 cents.

Where, then, has the Nation's prosperity gone since the world war began—into whose pockets? And, above all, where may we find the accumulations of wealth which may now be taxed to pay for the war with the least hardship or injustice to the public?

The following figures, selected almost at random from the great list of industrial corporations that have profited by war times, may suggest the answers to the above questions. They may also indicate the economic conditions which lie below the fact, reported by Prof. King, of the University of Wisconsin, that 2 per cent of the people of the United States own 65 per cent of the country's total wealth.

[1] Deficit. [2] 19 months. [3] 15 months.

Taking 24 of the principal companies listed above and comparing their earnings in 1914 and 1916, we find in these two years an increase of 500 per cent, and these increases may be expected to continue. For instance, the Steel Corporation's last quarter's earnings, just published, would indicate that; for, if the percentage is maintained for the whole year, the net sum applicable to dividends for 1917 should be about $450,000,000.

Comparing the increased earnings and the increased stock values of two of these corporations, we get a still more concrete idea of the increased wealth which offers the country a ready source of war taxation:

United States Steel Corporation.

Net earnings, 1914	$23,496,768
Net earnings, 1916	271,531,730
Increase	248,034,962
Average market value of outstanding stock in 1914	682,648,282
Average market value of outstanding stock in 1916	961,181,378
Increase	278,533,096

Bethlehem Steel Corporation.

Net earnings, 1914	$5,590,020
Net earnings, 1916	43,593,968
Increase	38,003,948
Average market value of outstanding stock in 1914	17,536,690
Average market value of outstanding stock in 1916	106,112,130
Increase	88,575,440

RAILROADS.

Shareholders of railroads have also improved their position as investors since the war began.

In 1913 the net operating revenue ran approximately from $275 a mile in January to $300 a mile in December. In 1916 the net operating revenue ran approximately from $337 a mile in January to $550 in October.

The net revenue for railroads earning over a million dollars annually for the six months ending January 1, 1917, was practically $700,000,000, which is the largest profit in the history of American railroading.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] is recognized.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, I shall support the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY], proposing in this item to increase the tax 1 per cent, and I shall then support the amendments that he states he expects to offer, making further increases through this section of the bill.

It seems very clear to me that these rates as provided in this bill ought to be increased; that they can be increased in a very substantial amount without hardship or serious sacrifice upon the part of any of the individuals upon whom they will fall, while on the other hand there are many features of the remaining provisions of this bill that will create hardships, and severe hardships, upon those who are least able to bear them; and it is my hope that if we can secure a substantial increase in the income tax, later on in the bill we may eliminate some of the consumption taxes that would fall upon the very poor people of this country if those taxes were allowed to remain.

Now, this proposed amendment operates only upon incomes between $5,000 and $7,500 a year, and, as the gentleman from Kentucky has said, it proposes an increase of $25 over that provided for in the bill. Is there anyone who will say that that $25 will be a hardship upon one who will be compelled to bear it? Members of Congress receiving a salary of $7,500 will be compelled to pay $25 more than they otherwise would. If he is unmarried, he would pay $245 on his congressional salary. With this income rate fixed he would pay $270.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LENROOT. Yes.

Mr. FESS. I was not in the Hall when the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] offered his amendment. How much is it proposed to raise in addition from the income tax by the proposed amendment?

Mr. LENROOT. This bill is being considered by paragraphs, and he has only offered an amendment to the first paragraph; but he states that he will offer increases as we go along through the bill until we reach a maximum of 50 per cent.

Mr. FESS. Has the gentleman any knowledge of the sum total of that increase?

Mr. LENROOT. I have not. I do not know what the gentleman will offer; but I will say this, that I had in mind offering a more moderate amendment than he proposes, increasing all of these rates 25 per cent. If that had been done, the increased levy from that alone under the figures submitted by the committee would have amounted to $93,000,000.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LENROOT. Yes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. What particular taxes would the gentleman eliminate in case the amendment carried?

Mr. LENROOT. I have two particularly in mind: The tax upon light and heat, and the freight-rate tax—that goes directly into consumption.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I agree with the gentleman there.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. LENROOT. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman suggests that we might have increased the income tax rate 25 per cent. Does he mean a flat 25 per cent on all incomes, or would he graduate it?

Mr. LENROOT. I mean taking the same graduations that you have in the bill.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. On a graduated scale?

Mr. LENROOT. Yes; on the graduated scale?

Mr. GARNER. Increasing it 25 per cent?

Mr. LENROOT. Yes. Now, it has been assumed by some that the highest of these income items in the bill, providing for 33 per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $500,000, means an income tax of 33 per cent upon the entire income in addition to the other taxes imposed. As the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] pointed out, that is not so at all. This 33 per cent applies only in this bill to an amount exceeding $500,000. The 30 per cent tax applies only to an income in excess of $300,000 and below $500,000; but under the statement put into the RECORD by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY], a man who has an income of $500,000 under the committee bill will pay only 33 per cent of his entire income, all told, while on the face of it some might think from this bill that he is paying 30 per cent in addition to the amount he is now paying.

Mr. GARNER. Let us take Mr. Ford as an example, if I may be permitted to use the illustration. According to the account of his return, made last year, it would be $30,000,000. On the basis of that it would amount to about 46 per cent of Mr. Ford's income.

Mr. LENROOT. Yes. That is the highest figure given by the committee.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield again right there?

Mr. LENROOT. Yes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. That will be the case as applied to a man like Mr. Ford. As to men who pay these high taxes, as a rule, the taxes imposed by the bill will take a larger part of their income than that, because they will pay a portion of the corporation tax and the excess profits tax.

Mr. LENROOT. That is true of everybody, no matter what his income is.

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LENROOT. Yes.

Mr. McCORMICK. As a matter of accuracy, I think that incomes of $5,000,000, as the bill stands, would pay 47.7 per cent, and incomes of $10,000.000 would pay 48.85 per cent.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. If the gentleman will pardon me, it will not be true of everybody. It will not be true of myself. I have no corporation stock of any kind and would have no excess profits.

Mr. LENROOT. It will be if the sources of his income are from corporations and business.

Now, much has been said of the income tax of England, and that in no case does it exceed an income tax of over 50 per cent. I believe that is true, but my understanding is that England to-day imposes a 50 per cent tax upon all incomes in excess of £20.000, or $100,000. Compare that with the provisions of the bill submitted by the committee, and men having an income of $100,000 under this bill will pay a total income tax of only 14.22 per cent as against an income tax in England of 50 per cent.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, I ask for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. McCORMICK. May I interrupt the gentleman?

Mr. LENROOT. Yes.

Mr. McCORMICK. The cables report that the British excess profits tax, which is a genuine tax on excess profits, is about to be increased to 80 per cent. It is now 60 per cent.

Mr. LENROOT. That is in addition to the 50 per cent income tax that I have been speaking of.

Mr. MADDEN. But there is quite a difference between the excess profits tax in England and the excess profits tax here.

Mr. LENROOT. Yes; and I am very sorry that we are not pursuing the policy of England in that respect. I believe it would be very much fairer if we could base the profit tax on the profits gained by corporations for two or three years preceding the beginning of the European war, as is the policy of England.

Mr' GORDON. What is the excess profits tax in England?

Mr. LENROOT. Seven hundred million dollars, I believe.

Mr. GORDON. I mean the rate.

Mr. LENROOT. It rises as high as 60 per cent. Now, Mr. Chairman, going back to the amendment, every man in this country, every man in this Congress, ought to bear his share of the burden. Every man ought to be called upon to make a sacrifice, and if not called upon to hazard his life for his country he ought not to complain if he makes the sacrifice of means to such an extent that it is a real sacrifice for him. For any man who has $100,000 income, if we take 50 per cent in excess of that, how much of a sacrifice is that man making for his country? How much is he suffering in being deprived of 50 per cent of his income over and above $100,000? Is it not fair and is it not more just to raise every dollar that we legitimately can through an income tax, a policy which as the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] has said will destroy no business, will shut down no factory, but simply take of a man a portion of the profits he receives whether his profits are from investment or whether they be from earnings—something he can easily afford to give up, rather than to have a tax such as is proposed by the committee to make up the sum of eighteen hundred million dollars through the onerous and burdensome consumption taxes which ought not to be imposed unless it is absolutely unavoidable? [Applause.]

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, as I understand it, there has been no estimate submitted to the committee or to this House of the amount of additional revenue which would be raised by the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY]. Certainly, it seems to me that before we undertake to revise the work of the committee we ought at least to know how much additional revenue would be produced by this suggestion. We ought also to know what items in the bill of proposed revenue it is to take the place of so that we may have an opportunity to balance the items eliminated against the proposition for that revenue.

But aside from the fact that the committee has not worked out this proposition with any care, or not worked it out at all, there is another proposition that I want to suggest to the committee. I am in thorough accord with a great many of the arguments of the gentleman from Kentucky and would consider them unanswerable if this was the only tax bill that I anticipated we would have prepared for the purposes of this war. But when we consider that this may be only the initial tax bill, we see that we must have a well-balanced system of taxation. Wars must be financed in two ways: First, by the ready cash, which is raised by the annual tax bill, and, second, by the borrowing power of the Government. It has always been the case that the length and duration of wars are underestimated.

Almost always the result has been that the borrowing power of the Government decreases as the war goes on; in other words, we resort ordinarily at the beginning of war to a very moderate use of the borrowing power of the Government and the credit is not strained. But as we go on there is a strain on the borrowing power compared with the taxing power left to the Government which begins to show a wide margin. Then the credit of the Government becomes impaired. Sound financiers tell us that the amount of money raised through taxation should increase during each year of the war and the amount relied upon by the sale of bonds should decrease if we want to preserve the just relation between the power of taxation and the power of the national credit. The difficulty is that we ordinarily undertake to reverse it. We must leave to ourselves as wide a margin as possible under the taxing power, and we must leave to ourselves as wide a margin as possible on the extension of our credit.

Mr. SHERLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BORLAND. Yes.

Mr. SHERLEY. Does the gentleman think that an increase from 1 to 2 per cent of surtax on incomes of a maximum of $7,500 is going to exhaust the taxing power of the Government on incomes?

Mr. BORLAND. No; I do not think so. I trust not. I hope it is not exhausting the taxing power, but I do not know any reason why we should approach the taxing power.

Mr. SHERLEY. It is not approaching it; it is not coming anywhere near to it.

Mr. BORLAND. Suppose we have occasion again and again, not once but twice, and no one knows how many times, to bring in further taxation bills.

Mr. SHERLEY. The gentleman seems to think because we get taxes one way and do not another we are lessening the burden. I am not interested about the amount of taxes to be raised now, but seeking to do it without burdening the people unduly.

Mr. BORLAND. I am quite agreed with the gentleman. I am opposed to indirect taxes, and I think the justification in this particular instance is the fact that they are largely levied on articles of luxury, with the exception of the blanket provision of tariff, the result of which none of us can foresee. I am not content with that; I am not content with several features of the bill. If I had the power to write the bill, I would strike out some of those provisions; but in the main I think the committee has undertaken to work out a well-balanced bill. I want to repeat that in order to finance the war we must maintain a scientific system of taxation. Our powers of taxation to provide for the redemption of and the interest on the issue of the bonds must always be left at a safe margin, and unless the gentleman can find out exactly how much he expects to raise by the change he suggests in the elimination of the particular tax in this bill and the other exemptions, it is our duty to vote it down; in other words, it is our duty to give the committee credit for having made up a well-balanced bill.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, at the very beginning I desire to say that I am fully aware that an enormous sum of money is required of our Government in the conduct of this war and in our efforts to aid those powers that are like us engaged in war against our enemy, and I am also fully conscious of the fact that we have long since become the richest Nation on earth and are capable of contributing the greatest sum of money for a given purpose than any other nation.

It has been my profoundest hope that the bill when it came out of committee would be in such form as to commend itself to our patriotic people as a wise, equitable, and fair revenue-raising law. In some particulars I must in fairness to the able and patriotic members of the Ways and Means Committee concede that they have acted wisely and well. But I can not go back to my tax-burdened people of the second district of Indiana, who in their partiality have sent me here to represent them, and with a clear conscience tell them that I stood for all the burdens and hardships and sacrifices that I know this measure must bring to them, without at least raising any voice in protest before the committee while the measure is being put into shape for final passage. I know that it will not be safe to refuse to pass the measure when it comes out of the committee. The tremendous undertaking we are engaged in is fraught with too much peril to permit of failure of the passage of a revenue bill by this session of this Congress; but, gentlemen of the committee, I beseech you to look around while you work, and in the name of common sense, of justice and mercy, do not further crush the fallen who in their anguish at this hour plead to you for help. Go to the schools, go to the homes of the laboring class of our people, who of necessity must furnish most of the boys to fight this great war, and see the pale and pinched little faces of children whose health and future usefulness is being undermined on account of the lack of food and clothing. Go to your grocer, your clothier, and your dealer in general merchandise and inquire the prices of the commonest necessities of life before you by certain provisions of this bill drive to further despair these millions of once prosperous Americans, who, in their now destitute condition, each day are required to make new sacrifices and self-denials, and take new burdens to their now bended shoulders.

You say we must raise $1,800,000,000 by this law. I dispute this proposition. I do not contend but that we must eventually raise this sum and several more billions on top of it, but I do contend that it is not necessary at this time, nor is it expedient nor fair, that so large a portion of the expense of the war be raised by this generation, who, with the exception of certain favored ones, are now standing all the burdens they can bear. This war is not for us alone. It is not for our children alone. If it brings anything of glory, anything of worth, anything of value, it will be enjoyed by those who live after we are dead and gone. If we are right in our declaration of war that it is for the perpetuation of our free government, then we fight for those to come as well as those now with us. And right here let me digress long enough to say that I differ with the President's position, if his position can be said to be expressed by his speech the other day at the dedication of the Red Cross Building here in Washington City, and in his last message to Congress, in which he said in substance:

We have no grievances, and are only in this war for the principles of democracy.

It is my belief that not only the democracy of the foreign world is at stake in this war but our own democratic form of government, our own rights and privileges, our very liberties and lives, and had I not so believed I would not have voted for war. Had I not thought that the privileges and blessings bequeathed to us by a heroic ancestry were in jeopardy I would not have given my consent to call to arms a million of our splendid men from the peaceful walks of life.

I think we should raise a large sum of money by the bill, and for the general welfare of the Nation in its present crisis I am willing to vote for a bill that will raise even a larger sum than I think should be taken from our people at this time. I am not one of those obstreperous and obstinate fellows who demand that the views of 435 men shall in all particulars coincide with my own, and shall only oppose in committee the parts of the bill reported by the committee that I can not in conscience approve. But, gentlemen, I am vitally interested in the source of this revenue. We should not by the imposition of this taxing measure create additional and unbearable burdens upon those whose wail of hunger and want we now hear, nor should we foolishly and ill-advisedly kill the goose that lays the golden egg by destroying industries and business enterprises, the continued prosperity of which is our guaranteed source of revenue.

You propose to tax incomes and, in taxing them, to add to the amount taken from future incomes a certain additional per cent of this and future years' income, on account of and based upon income taxes heretofore paid. You also propose to tax excess profits. This is all well and good as far as it goes, but as I see it, you did not go far enough. You also propose in this measure a heavy tax on beverages, cigars, tobacco, snuff, cigarette papers, transportation and amusement tickets, telephone or telegraph messages. Since most of them are under strict construction not classed as absolute necessities, I can approve this item under the circumstances, although I would prefer not to tax the poor man's one luxury, the 5-cent picture show. The tax upon insurance policies, decedent's estate, club dues, and the tax upon bonds, notes, deeds, stock certificates, and so forth, can be borne without unbearable hardships. The flat 10 per cent ad valorem custom duty upon many articles on the present dutiable list of imports, though unscientific and in many respects unfair and injurious, can be tolerated during this emergency. But, gentlemen, your proposed tax upon the necessities of life that are imported into this country free of duty and not in competition with our own products, is an outrageous and inexcusable blow at those who are poor and needy. You should not raise this revenue to carry on this war by a tariff that will make living higher, and if you place this additional load upon the backs of the American toiler you will hear from him in an emphatic way before you are through with it. You say you have not the time to scientifically adjust schedules. You took time in section 1001 of this bill to specifically single out not only the coffee and tea coming into this country but also the coffee and tea in the hands of the wholesalers of the Nation. This action can not be justified even as a war measure, either by a protectionist or a free trader and a tariff for revenue only advocate, if there are such fellows, should be ashamed to put the burden of the revenue of this war upon such articles of necessity as these, which must fall heavily upon the poor man and leave untouched the millions of income and profits of the rich. I know there are men with enormous incomes and business institutions getting very large profits that ask you to be lenient with them, but there are millions in this Nation to-day that only ask for a chance to live, to exist during this awful war. The various members of your committee have on this floor during the last week pleaded guilty to writing the most unscientific and in many instances burdensome and harmful tariff bill ever enacted into law, and your only excuse for doing so is that "we need the money." I admit that we may yet need the money, but I demand that until you can get time to pass a proper tariff law you leave this field untouched and raise the money needed from sources concerning which I will go more into detail later.

I am opposed to that section of your bill that taxes poster advertising and leaves untouched the great mass of newspaper and magazine advertising of the Nation. I want the Members of this House to have the courage to say to the newspapers and magazines, even at the risk of meeting with their opposition at the polls next election, "You shall not be singled out as a privileged class among advertisers." I would either include them or leave section 504 out of this bill altogether, and since I do not believe this House will consent to the proposed zone rate on second-class mail matter, and thus absolutely destroy many worthy agricultural, scientific, religious, and trade-union journals and publications, and whose advertising space is not large, I am of the opinion that it would be the part of wisdom to drop this section from the bill altogether.

It is not fair, nor profitable in the long run to impose a 5 per cent tax on the sale price of an automobile or a musical instrument, or the other manufactured products which you make subject to this tax. This tax is laid without regard to whether the plant is run at a profit or a loss. If it is run at a profit, you decrease your income and excess profits tax, and if at a loss you bury forever the industry that gives employment to our people. Increase your income and excess profits tax, and you can better defend yourself in saying that "we need the money." Let those pay most who are making most. No patriotic American at this hour has the right to complain that because his profits were large we took much of it away from him.

The profit maker is the one man that has much to defend in this war, he is the one man whose mouth should be closed from declaiming against paying the lion's share of expenses of this war. These war times brought him much, and we will not do our full duty unless we make him lay a fair proportion of it upon the alter of his country under whose flag he made it. Listen to these official figures of the net profits of American industrial corporations taken from their own reports:

Corporations.	1913	1916
American Beet Sugar Co.	$851,055	$2,445,189
American Woolen Co. (deficit)	1,179,791	5,883,819
Atlas Powder Co.	322,838	2,937,790
Bethlehem Steel Corporation	5,122,703	43,503,963
Brown Shoe Co.	710,466	1,457,757
Central Leather Co.	4,386,345	15,489,201
United States Steel Corporation	91,216,985	271,511,739
Westinghouse Air-Brake C.	5,255,259	9,396,103

In this bill you propose to take only a small part of this enormous profit of these and other great industrial firms, and at the same time attempt to defend the provisions of this bill that burdens the poor and needy who now, weakened as they are, stagger beneath their burdens, and to jeopardize the life of the little business man and the moderately well-to-do man who are fighting for their existence, but who furnish remunerative employment for our people. You say, "we need the money" and defend that part of this bill that is admitted by everyone will bring great burdens to those already in distress and at the same time you let a gentleman with a $1,000,000 income walk free with more than $500,000 of it which he can not hope to intelligently spend, and you at the same time put a 10 per cent flat duty on meat that comes from Argentina during these high-price times, when the war is our protective-tariff barrier, and my Democratic friends say this duty is put on the consumer. And while you say "we need the money" you let Henry Ford, with $30,000,000 income, get away with more than $15,000,000 of it. How are you going to defend that provision of your bill, when the Government must surely some day in the near future take charge of the meat distribution in order that our people can get a bite of meat once in a while? Gentlemen, if you want to encourage patriotism in the breasts of our brave people, if you want to marshal the wonderful resources of this Nation and truly put up the best possible front in this war, put the great burden of the expense of it on those who can the most easily afford to give it. I would not go as far as my friend KEATING, who proposes to take practically all of the incomes, because, like the little boy's apple core, there wouldn't be any income.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLAND. I yield to the gentleman, although he did not yield to me

Mr. KEATING. I apologize for my discourtesy. The gentleman says that he is anxious to take the money away from the millionaires. How far is the gentleman willing to go?

Mr. BLAND. I am willing to take enough money to raise the $1,800,000,000 proposed by this bill, after taking out the 10 per cent flat tariff on free-listed articles and after taking out the poster-advertisement clause and a few other unjust and inequitable measures that are in the bill. You do not need to go any further. We do not need to start a revolution here in order to raise this money, and I am afraid the gentleman's provision would revolutionize business and incomes generally.

Mr. KEATING. If you vote for my amendment, you will raise $600,000,000.

Mr. BLAND. The increased postage of this act will increase the postal revenues about 33⅓ per cent—a 2-cent letter will cost 3 cents, a postal card will cost 2 cents, and other increases are made.

Postmasters of the fourth class get all the cancellation of the office up to $200 per year. They get 60 per cent of the next $400 per year; they get 50 per cent of the next $800 per year; they get 40 per cent of the balance they cancel. And every time a first, second, or third class office increases its receipts so many dollars the postmaster gets an increase, and in a few instances this means a $1,000 increase. If a fourth-class post office gets enough receipts, it becomes a third-class office and a new salary schedule goes into effect. With the different classes of post offices goes the village and city delivery, and so forth. Here is a table of the first, second, and third class post-office receipts and salaries which I will ask to have inserted into the RECORD:

[1] By special acts of Congress the salaries of the postmasters at New York, N. Y., Chicago, Ill., Philadelphia, Pa., Boston, Mass., and St. Louis, Mo., are fixed at $8,000 a year.

Now, to my great surprise—and probably I should not say that, for under all the circumstances I can not say I was unduly surprised, although I had talked with members of the committee on the subject before the bill was reported—I learned, after the bill was agreed upon in committee and before it was taken up in the House, that no provision had been made in the bill to prevent a very large part of this revenue collected from the people on account of war necessity from going into the pockets of the many thousands of postmasters of the Nation.

I prepared an amendment for this bill, and here it is:

And provided further, That the salaries of all postmasters at offices of the first, second, and third classes shall not be increased after July 1, 1917, during the existence of the present war.

And provided further, That the compensation of postmasters at offices of the fourth class shall continue to be computed on the basis of the present rates of postage.

The Post Office Department furnished this information and assisted in getting it up, although I am not committing them one way or the other on this amendment.

I have learned that the chairman of the committee [Mr. KITCHIN], since I prepared the amendment, has received an exact copy of it and intends to introduce it as a committee amendment. I certainly will gladly support the amendment when presented and will offer it if the gentleman from North Carolina does not.

It is my opinion, gentlemen, that when we get through amending this bill it will be much better than it is to-day, and I think that every Member of the House should feel free to vote for a proper amendment and not let his sense of loyalty to the members of that committee, all of whom are splendid men, prevent him from doing his full duty as his conscience dictates. [Applause.]

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. FOSTER, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 4280) to provide revenue to defray war expenses, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED.

The SPEAKER announced his signature to enrolled joint resolution of the following title:

S. J. Res. 61. Joint resolution to grant authority for the erection of temporary buildings at the headquarters of the American Red Cross, Washington, D. C.

THE REVENUE BILL.

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 4280, the war-revenue measure.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 4280, with Mr. FOSTER in the chair.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I shall support the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr SHERLEY], but I shall ask the Clerk to read in my time an amendment to this section, which would apply all along to the increases which I would favor.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I favor the increases suggested by this amendment which I have had read, but if the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky should prevail, then I understand that subsequent consideration will be given to amendments to the other subdivisions that follow. However, the proposition which I have had read gives substantially my idea of the increases that we could be entirely justified in putting into the bill. I think there is no one amongst us who does not realize that there is a great deal of unjustifiable complaint being made by many with regard to the various items of taxation in the bill, but I think that no reasonable man can fail to realize that there are many items of taxation in the bill that are utterly unjustifiable, if we can secure the money by any other means that will not be so harmful to the business of the country, and especially to the poor man of the country. I think that there is no question but that it would be wise for us, instead of making the decrease in the exemption from $4,000 to $2,000 and $3,000 to $1,000, to provide that the exemption shall be from $4,000 to $3,000 and from $3,000 to $2,000. I will favor that kind of an amendment if it should be offered, or offer it myself. That would decrease by $40,000,000, according to the estimate of the committee, the amount that would be received, and yet I am inclined to think that could be fully justified by the increases now under consideration to the individual income-tax list.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TOWNER. Yes.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Does the gentleman realize that under his amendment he would put a tax on the larger incomes greater than Great Britain now imposes in the third year of the war?

Mr. TOWNER. Yes. I think on the higher incomes that would be true, but upon those that are lower it would not be true. On the whole, I think this kind of a schedule would be vastly more favorable to American citizens than the English income-tax system, but I suggest to the gentleman that if he thinks the proposed amendments carry too heavy a burden on individuals, that that burden will be so placed as not to bear heavily on the poor man. Neither will it interfere so much with the business of the country. Neither will it bear so heavily on the consumption cost of the necessaries of life. Surely, these are legitimate objects for our consideration.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, a while ago when the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] presented his views on the income-tax proposition, I asked recognition for the purpose of opposing it. I do not presume that anybody realizes more definitely than myself that there is a great deal of deprivation to be made during this war and we have got to make that deprivation in order to meet the enormous expenditures of the war. But I do not like the taste of the proposition of the gentleman from Kentucky, and the reason I do not like it is this: He is making up the most comfortable bed for some of our weak-kneed brethren who have got some pet industries in their districts to lie on. The first thing you know we are going to eliminate from this bill by a piecemeal patchwork so many items carried in this bill that we are going to have practically no bill left when we get through. Now, what does this mean? I know. One per cent, striking the little fellows down at the bottom, the men who have got large families in this day and generation of increased cost of living, and with war prices on the rampage has a pretty narrow margin now.

Mr. SHERLEY. If the gentleman will yield, I announced that I was going to carry it out through the other paragraphs.

Mr. HOWARD. I understand the gentleman, and I always delight in listening to the gentleman, because I do not know any man who has been the father of more good sound legislation in this House and who can present a matter with more force and logic and get more gentlemen to see the way he thinks when he is sometimes wrong than my friend the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY]. [Applause and laughter.] But here is this proposition: The first thing you know, what is going to happen is the beer people are going to come, and they will say, "You have increased the incomes. Let us out." The liquor fellows, the rectifiers, they will say, "You have got this money by income tax, let this tax on the rectifiers go off." Here will come my good friend DOREMUS, of Michigan, and say, "We have got this tax on incomes, let us knock out the tax on automobiles." Now, the gentleman from Ohio the other day in the heat of debate said something about an industry in my district. According to the industry in that district it has been hit harder and heavier than the district of any other gentleman in this House, to wit, the soft-drink industry. You have knocked off 14 per cent. I have not kicked about it, because I take it that the committee will do justice by all where injustice is apparent.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The gentleman might have stated it higher, several hundred per cent on the carbonic gas.

Mr. HOWARD. Now, let us see what you have done. I will say it is an injustice to those people to confiscate a business, or make them do business for nothing or at a loss. I say there are injustices in this bill and yet the gentleman from Kentucky starts down at the small incomes to raise it. Now, let us see under this bill what a Member of Congress—I know we have got some pretty well-to-do Members in here, but they are mighty few. I said here a few months ago that the majority of the membership of this House were about 30 seconds ahead of the sheriff with a common-law judgment. [Laughter.] We are all poor men as a rule. But now let us see what we pay. Under the present law we pay $70 a year if we are married. Under this bill we pay a tax equivalent to $205. Under the proposed amendment of Mr. SHERLEY we pay $230. We will take a man who has an income of $7,500 to $10,000. Under the old law he pays $120, under this law he pays $355, and under the scale of the gentleman from Kentucky he will pay $405 on that income. Now, let us see what these men have got.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HOWARD. I would like five minutes more, if it is not in violation of the rule.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. HOWARD. Now, let us see. These incomes are numerous. More men in this country make $10,000 than make a million dollars, or $500,000 or $50,000. Now, you want to get the great bulk of these taxes, and I will venture the assertion that the gentleman from Kentucky can not come within $25,000,000 this minute of estimating what his increase will produce, and I will venture the assertion that when the expert from the Treasury Department figures his estimate out that they will not increase this $25,000,000 on the incomes the gentleman from Kentucky proposes to increase. Now, I would like to go as far as my distinguished friend from Colorado [Mr. KEATING] on some things. He is a brainy, level-headed, conscientious, devoted representative of his people, but I am afraid that if we went up as high as he went, that folks would immediately get out of business rather than pay all to the country. They would say, "What is the use?" You have got to have some incentive to make a man get out and conduct a business. He proposes to take all of it. I tell you what I do believe. When it comes down to hitting a fellow who is getting over a half million dollars income I am not weak-kneed about going up to him and telling him what I want. I propose to offer an amendment before this debate is over and at the proper place to take 66 per cent on incomes over $500,000.

Mr. SHERLEY. Is not the gentleman making that same soft bed for other people?

Mr. HOWARD. No, sir; I am not, not at all; because I raise the revenue and will get the money and the gentleman's proposition will not.

You are going to knock out the tax on these waybills and receipts, and one thing and another. That is transportation. That is going to be knocked out because you do not want to put a tax on consumption. All of you are going to vote for that flat 10 per cent increase on nondutiable stuff that comes over here. You are going to take it off of consumption, and all of you will vote for it on that side, and if I belonged to that school, I would vote for it, too. All of you are going to vote for that tariff except my friend here from Connecticut. I do not know whether he will swallow it or not.

Oh, my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] might balk at a small tariff of 10 per cent. They believe in 90 and 100 per cent. But you will take it off of your waybills because it is visited on consumption, and you will turn right around and put it on consumption by a tariff. That is what I call consistency. I am in favor of and shall introduce amendments to make the great incomes of this country bear such burden as they should to conduct this war.

Mr. MEEKER. Mr. Chairman, I want just at this time to take a moment to get into the RECORD and before the committee some figures in response to the request of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], made when I spoke on Monday as regards the circulation of the St. Louis newspapers. At my request Mr. E. Lansing Ray, the vice president of the Globe-Democrat, has sent in this verified report from St. Louis:

MAY 15, 1917.

Hon. JACOB E. MEEKER,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. MEEKER: Following definite information received directly from St. Louis this morning:

Circulation.	County.	City.
Globe-Democrat:	Per cent.	Per cent.
Daily	49	51
Sunday	60	40
Weekly farm edition	100	.....
Post-Dispatch:
Daily	8	92
Sunday	55	45
Republic:
Daily	54	42
Weekly farm edition	100	.....

The county percentages above noted are divided between mail and express shipments, as follows:

Circulation.	Mail.	Express.
Globe-Democrat:	Per cent.	Per cent.
Daily	93	7
Sunday	88	12
Weekly	100	.....
Post-Dispatch:
Sunday	47	53
Republic:
Daily	54	4
Weekly	100	.....

From these figures it is apparent that the proposed mail increases will fall very heavily on all three St. Louis papers, and especially so on the two morning papers, which have on their daily editions a large rural-route subscription, which can not be diverted to express and secure the rural-route delivery on the routes. This is a retroactive penalty on us, as subscriptions in most cases on all editions for mail subscribers are taken for a year's term, and no increase can be charged before subscription expirations. The weekly farm editions are all direct mail subscriptions, going straight to the homes of the farmers. There is no city circulation on the weeklies.

I haven't zone distribution figures. Their compilation would mean counting all galley lists, but the total increase of postage charges under proposed basis is approximately correct, as we gave them to you yesterday. Our experts used all possible care to arrive at accurate estimates.

The circulation corrections I mentioned I desired to give you in place of former figures are as follows:

Post-Dispatch Sunday circulation 360,000 instead of 230,000, and Globe-Democrat Sunday circulation 180,000 instead of 163,000.

I will not take any more of the time of the House, but will say that on page 2297 of the RECORD they can see by comparing there—that is, the speech of Monday—what this really means to this one group of papers?

Mr. RUBEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MEEKER. Yes.

Mr. RUBEY. In the speech made by the gentleman the other day he made the statement that the increase that would come to the Globe would be $200,000 annually and to the Republic $175,000.

Mr. MEEKER. Yes.

Mr. RUBEY. And to the Post-Dispatch about $87,000?

Mr. MEEKER. Yes.

Mr. RUBEY. I have the figures here of the postage paid at the end of the last fiscal year, as follows:

Postage paid at cent-a-pound rate on mailings of the following publications, fiscal year ended June 30, 1916.

The St. Louis Globe-Democrat:
Daily edition	$89,305.47
Semiweekly edition	14,017.91
The St. Louis Republic:
Daily edition	51,536.96
Semiweekly edition	20,060.34
The St. Louis Post-Dispatch, daily	47,864.01

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MEEKER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. RUBEY. Now, if the figures given by you are correct, then the amount these papers pay is considerably more than double the amount that they will have to pay under the present rate. And I think that your figures are rather extravagant.

Mr. MEEKER. I will say that all this data which I have given comes to me from the men on the paper. I do not give them on my own authority at all. But I am satisfied as to their integrity. These were the representatives of the newspapers, and I think if the gentleman has received a circular from, for instance, the Outlook and from some of the other papers, saying what this increase is going to mean to them, he will see that this is not much out of line.

Mr. RUBEY. The figures I am giving are from the Post Office Department.

Mr. MEEKER. I thank the gentleman. Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. SABATH rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH] is recognized.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I am indeed gratified that the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HOWARD] and the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. KEATING] are going to raise the needed revenue for the Government. [Laughter.] As it is now, I notice that the State the first-named gentleman represents—namely, the State of Georgia—paid into the Treasury of the United States or raised the sum of $1,392,000 last year, and the State of Colorado, $1,665,000. On the other hand, the State of Illinois paid in over $65,000,000, or 50 times as much as Georgia and 40 times as much as Colorado.

I would like to know what taxation these gentlemen will suggest and favor so that their respective States will be doing their part in raising the needed revenue.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield to the gentleman from Virginia?

Mr. SABATH. In a moment. I would like to know whether the gentleman from Georgia desires to raise the additional revenue by levying it on some of the other States, or whether he is willing that his State and some of the adjoining States should pay a part or a portion of it.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SABATH. In just one moment.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I wanted to caution the gentleman that this is a nonsectional bill. [Laughter.]

Mr. SABATH. I know it is; and I know that the gentlemen who framed it intended that it should be, and it is not my desire to bring in sectionalism. No one has ever charged me with it, and I hope no one ever will.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SABATH. Yes.

Mr. HARDY. Will the gentleman permit me to suggest that he has simply repeated the oft-made argument of the other side, that the Government gets all its revenue from the port that pays the dues?

Mr. SABATH. Did I understand you to say "port"?

Mr. HARDY. Yes. That is the argument they make.

Mr. SABATH. I am not following their argument. I never did agree with that side. [Laughter.]

Mr. HARDY. I did not say you did.

Mr. SABATH. I want to say that I only agree with them when they are right, and they are right so seldom that it is not very often that I can agree with them. [Laughter.]

Mr. HARDY. I think that there is a fallacy in the argument that the gentleman makes, even conceding that $65,000,000 is paid by Illinois, because it is passed on to the consumer.

Mr. SABATH. Yes; I agree that most of it is paid by the consumer, but not in the gentlemen's States, Georgia, Colorado, or even Texas. This, however, is known. I simply wanted to make a brief observation on a matter that might be of interest to some of the gentlemen here, but inasmuch as I find some objection to that line of argument I will proceed to discuss the amendment that is proposed.

I would like to support the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY]. I shall, if my amendment should fail, support his amendment after he reaches the items of about $25,000. I believe up to that time the percentage is fair, and I expect to offer amendments increasing the tax on all incomes above $25,000. Later on I am going to ask unanimous consent that my amendment may be read for the information of the House.

Now, I am willing to raise the needed tax by an income tax so far as we possibly can do it, and I am not going to wait, like my friend from Georgia [Mr. HOWARD], until we reach those whose incomes are above a million dollars. I am willing to start with those who have incomes above $25,000, and commence to raise the tax in proportion, so that there shall be no discrimination. After I have reached the half-million-dollar mark I propose to tax all the incomes 66 per cent. I do not try to go as far as my friend from Colorado [Mr. KEATING], because I do not think his amendment has a chance, notwithstanding the plea that he has made for it. The principle is right but the purpose is wrong.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SABATH. Yes.

Mr. HOWARD. Will my friend allow me to correct one statement? I stop where the gentleman starts, and I said that when we got to $500,000 I would tax all over $500,000.

Mr. SABATH. I regret that I have misunderstood the gentleman from Georgia. I am glad the gentleman favors a larger tax on the great incomes and that he agrees with my scale or with my amendment, and is even willing to go me one better.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. SABATH. I ask five minutes more, so that I may have read the amendment that I desire to offer.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SABATH. I am going to ask the Clerk to read the amendment that I desire to offer later on.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. That in addition to the additional tax imposed by subdivision (b) of section 1 of such act of September 8, 1916, there shall be levied, assessed, collected, and paid a like additional tax upon the income of every individual received in the calendar year 1917 and every calendar year thereafter, as follows:

One per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $5,000 and does not exceed $7,500;

Two per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $7,500 and does not exceed $10,000;

Three per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $10,000 and does not exceed $12,500;

Four per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $12,500 and does not exceed $15,000;

Five per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $15,000 and does not exceed $20,000;

Six per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $20,000 and does not exceed $35,000;

Eight per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $35,000 and does not exceed $50,000;

Eleven per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $50,000 and does not exceed $60,000;

Fourteen per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $60,000 and does not exceed $75,000;

Seventeen per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $75,000 and does not exceed $100,000;

Twenty per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $100,000 and does not exceed $125,000;

Twenty-four per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $125,000 and does not exceed $150,000;

Twenty-seven per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $150,000 and does not exceed $175,000;

Thirty per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $175,000 and does not exceed $200,000;

Thirty-three per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $200,000 and does not exceed $250,000;

Forty per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $250,000 and does not exceed $300,000;

Forty-five per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $300,000 and does not exceed $350,000;

Fifty per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $350,000 and does not exceed $400,000;

Fifty-five per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $400,000 and does not exceed $450,000;

Sixty per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $450,000 and does not exceed $500,000; and

Sixty-six per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $500,000;

Mr. SABATH. I regret that I have not succeeded in having the Clerk read the amendment as I have prepared it; he merely read the lines where it was not intended that the lines should be read. I mean the number of the lines. I do propose to raise the amount up to 66 per cent when we reach the $500,000, or half a million dollars' mark. I believe that after a person has an income of over $50,000 he can afford to pay 10 to 12 per cent, and after his income is over $100,000 he can afford to pay 20 to 25 per cent, and after it is over $200,000, or between $200,000 and $250,000, he will not go broke if he is assessed 40 to 50 per cent, and any man whose income is half a million or above can easily afford to pay 66 per cent and still will have enough with which to buy the necessaries of life. Now, I have no doubt the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] is well intended.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SABATH. Yes.

Mr. COX. How much additional tax would the gentleman's figures bring above that estimated by the committee?

Mr. SABATH. I can only guess, but I presume it will raise between four and five hundred million more than the present bill.

Mr. COX. Has the gentleman had any experts to figure it up?

Mr. SABATH. No; I do not rely on experts. We do not and can not always call in the experts. You can get almost any figures you desire from the experts. I am fairly good on figures and come as near as some of those so-called experts.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SABATH. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. If the House should accept the gentleman's figures and raise more money, what would he move to strike out in lieu thereof?

Mr. SABATH. There are several provisions in the bill that we could strike out without injuring the bill.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. What would the gentleman strike out, because that would enter into the calculations of the committee? The gentleman has no suggestion?

Mr. SABATH. Oh, yes; I have. If the gentleman will give me more time, I will tell him what I would strike out.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman have five minutes more in order to tell the committee what he would strike out.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Illinois be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Now, if the gentleman by his amendment raises four or five hundred million dollars additional, what items would he strike out?

Mr. SABATH. I will tell the gentleman a few of the things that I would eliminate. In the first place, I would eliminate the retroactive provision in the bill, wherein you are trying to reach the additional incomes for the year 1916, which in many instances have already been expended. In my opinion this section would cause a great deal of unnecessary complications.

I would also eliminate all of your stamp-tax provisions with the exception of that part which provides for a tax on corporation stock certificates and on all bonds.

I would eliminate section 302, which discriminates to the extent of 15 cents per gallon against the rectifiers, and to that extent favors the distillers. The 15 cents is in addition to the tax of $1.10 which is being paid now on whisky.

I would eliminate section 501, wherein you put the tax on the individual consumer instead of on the corporation.

I would eliminate section 504, which discriminates against the smaller and in favor of the big advertiser.

I would eliminate the tax on 5, 10, and 15 cent moving-picture admission tickets.

I would surely eliminate section 701, which provides for a tax on the dues paid by members of athletic and social clubs.

Above all, I would eliminate section 1000, which places on the duty list raw material which it has taken us years to put on the free list.

I would also eliminate section 1200, which increases the rate on first-class mail from 2 to 3 cents and on post cards from 1 to 2 cents. By no means would I let section 1200 stand, but if additional revenue must be raised from that source, then I would equally and equitably divide the tax between the profitable advertising matter instead of the educational lines.

Nor would I reduce the exemption of married men or heads of families from $4,000 to $2,000. If a reduction must be made, it should not go below $3,000, because, due to the high cost of living, manipulation and speculation in food products, which should be stopped immediately, the cost of maintaining a family is just twice what it was a year or two ago.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman is striking out so much of the bill that he would have to rewrite it.

Mr. SABATH. Oh, no; these items that I would strike out do not amount to as much as we would secure by adopting only one-half of my proposed increase in the income-tax schedule.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Would he raise any money to prosecute the war?

Mr. SABATH. Yes; I would raise it from the incomes and excess-profits tax, and by doing so we could in no way be charged with disturbing conditions or discriminating against any industry. By adopting my income-tax schedule and increase of the surplus-profits tax no honest and patriotic citizen could object, as we would be taxing profits and surplus instead of losses and shortages.

Mr. KITCHIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SABATH. Yes.

Mr. KITCHIN. The gentleman stated that he would knock out section 302. What is that about?

Mr. SABATH. That is a section put in by the committee by mistake. [Laughter.]

Mr. KITCHIN. It refers to rectified whisky, does it not?

Mr. SABATH. That is an additional tax of 15 cents on the small rectifiers. I do not object to an increase in the tax on beer or to an increase in the tax on whisky, but this 15 cents that is put on rectifiers is in addition to the general tax of $2.20 per gallon and is a discrimination in favor of the distillers and against the rectifiers and applies not only to whisky but also to wines that are refined or purified.

Mr. KITCHIN. What other sections did the gentleman want to strike out? I did not catch the numbers.

Mr. SABATH. If I had the time I would give the gentleman all of them. Section 501, 504, 506, 701, 1000, 1200——

Mr. KITCHIN. All right; I have got enough.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to the Sherley amendment, and it is useless to discuss the others if you stop to think a minute on what the others are. The amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky proposes to double the first item, and then increases it consecutively until the change at last would be from about 47 per cent, as proposed by the bill, to 55 per cent. The gentleman from Iowa proposes an amendment which would raise the highest rate to 50 per cent surtax additional under this bill, making about 67 per cent of the whole income. I hope every Member will remember that all taxes in this bill are additional to the present tax except one which I will refer to in a minute. The gentleman from Colorado puts no limit on his wishes and wants to take it all. Of course, it is useless to discuss his amendment, which is the plan of Mr. Amos Pinchot. It is simply the argument of the highwayman with a pistol in his hand and the victim helpless before him.

The amendment offered by the gentleman from Kentucky is not a reasonable amendment if properly understood. I do not think he quite realizes what it is. I was a Member of Congress when the gentleman from Kentucky came here, and I want to say now that the best argument I ever heard on any subject before the Ways and Means Committee was made by SWAGAR SHERLEY, a new member, on a constitutional question before that committee. I have always looked up to him with admiration and respect and with the firm belief that the longer he stayed here the more he would impress himself upon the people of this country. [Applause.]

I want to ask him now if he considers the amendment he has made, adding 1 per cent to the first item and going on in increasing ratio to the rates in the bill, a fair one?

Mr. SHERLEY. I answer the gentleman by saying that what I propose to do is to add 1 per cent for the first four subdivisions and 25 per cent for all the rest.

Mr. HILL. Let me repeat the question and confine it to one subdivision. Perhaps the question is wholly unnecessary, but I want to ask him whether he believes that the 1 per cent added to the first subdivision is enough or too much or too little, or whether, in his judgement, it is a fair increase?

Mr. SHERLEY. I might answer the gentleman that it approaches justice just as nearly as the arbitrary arrangement which has the approval of the gentleman from Connecticut.

Mr. HILL. I accept the answer that it is fair and a just addition, and if he will turn over to page 5 of the bill he will find that there has already been added 1½ per cent to this section and every other section of the bill relating to the income tax. So the bill is beyond the point where he himself says it is fair and just, for there is $110,000,000 in addition to the rates contained in this schedule—33⅓ per cent of the amount paid under the present law last year.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HILL. Yes.

Mr. SHERLEY. Some of us think it would be better to raise the taxes on this year's income than to carry that retroactive provision.

Mr. HILL. That is exactly what the committee has done. They have not carried any retroactive provision. There is where the mistake is. The situation was this: We reached a point in the committee where we were $110,000,000 shy of raising the amount which the administration said they must have. How was it to be done? It was discussed whether we should make the normal tax 4 or 5 per cent, or whether we should introduce new features of taxation, whether we should add it to the whisky tax, in which we did not go to the full extent it was desired we should go, to cover that amount, whether we should add it to the tobacco tax or various other taxes, and the final conclusion of the whole matter was that it should be added to the income tax.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Connecticut has expired.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HILL. It was finally decided that we should add it to the income tax and have it measured by one-third of the amount which the income-tax payers paid last year. The language is unfortunate. I concede that it gives the appearance of a retroactive tax. It is not. It is an increase of the income tax this year to more than the gentleman's amendment would carry.

Mr. SHERLEY. But it is measured upon the income of last year and is retroactive.

Mr. HILL. You might have said the same thing if we had made the normal tax 5 per cent instead of 4, that it might have been measured as one-half of what the income tax was last year.

Mr. SHERLEY. Oh, no. In one instance you are making your percentage apply to incomes of this year and in the other you are making your percentage apply to incomes of last year.

Mr. HILL. The section reads as follows:

SEC. 5. That every individual, corporation, joint-stock company or association, or insurance company that is liable to pay or that has paid the taxes imposed by Title I of such act of September 8, 1916, upon the net income received in the calendar year 1916, shall pay, in addition to such taxes, a tax equivalent to 33⅓ per cent of such taxes——

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HILL. Yes.

Mr. LENROOT. Does the gentleman contend that that is an annual tax?

Mr. HILL. I do not so contend, but I do contend that it is not. I contend, furthermore, it was put in just that way, in my judgment, in order to prevent its being an annual tax.

Mr. LENROOT. Then the gentleman's argument does not apply to the bill except for the present year.

Mr. HILL. That is all, and we are only legislating for the present year.

Mr. LENROOT. Oh, no; this bill is not limited to that.

Mr. HILL. I understand that; but this additional income is limited to this year, and Congress is going to meet again next year.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HILL. Yes.

Mr. SHERLEY. What is the gentleman's definition of a retroactive tax?

Mr. HILL. My definition of a retroactive tax is what the administration recommended us to do, and which we threw out by unanimous vote, and that was to put the whole of last year's tax in as a reenactment of the tax of last year. And I call upon the chairman of this committee to say whether in his judgment he meant this simply as a retroactive tax or as an addition to the present year's income tax?

Mr. SHERLEY. It does not matter what you call it. It is based on last year's income.

Mr. HILL. But the administration recommended the reenactment of the whole of it.

Mr. SHERLEY. I am not talking about that.

Mr. HILL. And we repudiated that by a unanimous vote. Mr. Chairman, much has been said here about the English tax. I have the best authority in the United States, in my judgment, Mr. Seligman, of Columbia University, right before me:

The English income tax is now levied at a rate of from about 12 per cent to a rate amounting to about 34 per cent on the highest incomes.

Under this bill a man will have to pay from 47 to 50 per cent of his income at the high rates, and only 4 per cent on the low rates. England starts at 12 per cent and goes to 30 per cent. We go up 20 per cent higher than that. In addition to that for this year, and this year only, we will pay an amount equal to 33⅓ per cent of what the old law called for last year. I think you want to be fair about it. I think the House of Representatives means to be fair, but whether you mean to be fair or not, you can not afford to do this thing, and why? Because you will not get income tax but once each year, and this war may last longer than one year. I do not say that in any threatening way. I say it simply from common-sense business principles. You put into operation such a proposition as Amos Pinchot is fathering—yes; even the proposition going to 67 per cent of incomes, double what England is collecting after the third year of the war, and incomes will run to cover, and there is plenty of cover to run to. Oh, some gentleman said that it would force these men to buy the bonds. Mr. Chairman, I have nothing but contempt for the patriotism of a man who holds it at somebody else's expense. Patriotism that is held in that way will not stand the test when the test comes. But I say incomes will run to cover. Where will they go? State bonds, municipal bonds, county bonds, such bonds of all kinds, all free from taxation—an abundant place for the investment of these incomes. Most of those bonds pay from 4 to 5 per cent, while these bonds pay only three and a half per cent. Which are they going to buy? If you frighten them out of it, they are going there, and, as I heard a Senator say yesterday in the hearings, "If you do such a thing, your bonds and your wall paper will both bear the same value." We can not afford to do this thing. In my judgment, this committee has gone beyond the point of diminishing returns in fixing it as high as we have, and in adding to it the additional tax of $100,000,000 to be placed upon these incomes was, in my judgment, altogether too high.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield for a question for information?

Mr. HILL. I will.

Mr. FESS. I notice we have something like 11 or 12 sources of taxation in the bill.

Mr. HILL. Yes.

Mr. FESS. One of which is on incomes?

Mr. HILL. Yes.

Mr. FESS. How many sources of taxation has Great Britain—that is, a man who pays an income tax—how many other kinds of taxes does he pay?

Mr. HILL. I will tell the gentleman; I have it right here, absolutely up to date by the Department of Commerce, made for me a few days ago. I have the list right here. Customs—I do not want to enter upon a controverted question, but I say to you, gentlemen, that England, Ireland, and Scotland last year collected between four hundred and five hundred million dollars from customs, with a population of forty millions of people, and we collected $210,000,000 from a population of 100,000,000 people. On the basis of Great Britain, and applying their rates to our importations and our population, we should raise a thousand million dollars from customs and never reach the protective point. [Applause.] But I do not care to go into that question——

Mr. FESS. What other sources?

Mr. HILL. I will read them to you: Customs, excise, estate, and so forth, and duties, stamps, land tax, house duty, property, and income tax—including supertax—excess-profits duty, land-value duty, postal service, telegraph service, telephone service, Crown lands, receipts from Suez Canal, shares and sundry loans, miscellaneous. Even the panes of glass in the windows are taxed over there. Even the monogram on the automobile is taxed, and I say to you, gentlemen, that if you pursue a policy such as indicated by Mr. Pinchot you will look forward to a time when a man who pays the bills says he will own the country as the privileged classes do in England. I do not want to see any money aristocracy in this country. The income tax is the only thing to-day that saves the privilege of the aristocracy of Great Britain, the immense burdens which they carry. Gentlemen, I would not agree to all that is proposed to be done here, if I had my way about this bill, but I voted for it.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HILL. Certainly.

Mr. KEATING. The gentleman has conveyed the impression to the House, I am sure, that the proposed income tax is more drastic than the tax levied in England.

Mr. HILL. I conveyed no impression. I have quoted from the best tax authority in the United States, that England's tax begins at 12 per cent and stops at 30, and ours begins at 4 per cent and stops at 50, and the gentleman proposes to carry it to confiscation.

Mr. LENROOT. Will the gentleman yield for one correction?

Mr. HILL. I do.

Mr. LENROOT. I want to say I heard one of the English commissioners say less than 10 days ago that their maximum was 50 per cent and commenced at £20,000, or $100,000.

Mr. KEATING. Will the gentleman yield for one more question?

Mr. HILL. Yes.

Mr. KEATING. Is it not a fact that England, with her wealth estimated at $85,000,000,000, is raising $1,000,000,000 or more a year from income taxes, and the wealth of the United States is estimated at more than $200,000,000,000, twice as wealthy as England?

Mr. HILL. It is, and the conditions are mighty different. England, with its back to the wall, stands to-day fighting for its life, and the President of the United States told you last Saturday night that this Nation has gone into this war "with no special grievance of its own."

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman yield right there for a question suggested by the question just asked him?

Mr. HILL. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. The State of Iowa has the greatest per capita wealth of any State in the Union. The State of Kansas, the State of Nebraska have as great or greater percentage of wealth than Illinois a much greater per capita of wealth than New England, according to the official reports.

Mr. HILL. That is right, if you count the land.

Mr. CANNON. And yet gentlemen speaking of England's wealth and of our wealth overlook the fact that the majority of our wealth in this country is not affected except at the very lowest rate for incomes.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HILL. I would like to have about five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Connecticut that he have five minutes additional? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. HILL. I want to call attention to one thing more——

Mr. HOUSTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HILL. In a moment or so. England has no States which lay income taxes of their own. What is laid by the General Government is all there is, nothing more. Here the State from which the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] comes lays an income tax; my State has just enacted an income tax in the last session. If I am not mistaken, something like 20 to 25 of the States in the Union now have income taxes, and the same thing is true of inheritance taxes. I stood here a day or two ago and referred to Mr. Harkness, a multimillionaire, who recently died in California. His estate was $40,000,000, as I am told. If this bill had been in operation, gentlemen, we would have taken 40 per cent of his estate, California would have taken 40 per cent of his estate, we would have taken the equal of 2 per cent of the estate for income taxes, and if they had been required to settle and sell the estate to pay these taxes the estate would not have netted enough to have buried him and put a monument over his grave. You have got to consider that there are other things than what we are doing.

The man who pays the income tax that you have added in this bill also pays an income tax under the old law, a corporation tax which comes out of him in many cases, an estate tax which comes out of him at the end, and an excess-profits tax which comes out of him if he is in business, and back of it all the taxes of the locality in which he resides.

Mr. SABATH. Are not all of these taxes that any individual pays first deducted from this income tax, and the only income he pays is on that which is a net profit after paying all of the taxes and all the expenses?

Mr. HILL. I will state just one thing, and then I am going to stop. This House a year ago provided another form of tax-free investments—farm-mortgage bonds to the amount of which there is no limit, 4½ and 5 per cent interest, free of taxes of all kinds and character. This Government loan is 3½ per cent instead of 4½ and 5 per cent. The hiding of the millionaire's income will be because of unfair action by the Government, and as a business proposition it can not afford to be unfair. I stand here as a Republican partisan determined to do my utmost to sustain this administration, according to my ability and my might, and I want all you Democrats to come and help the Republicans in supporting this administration, and not destroy this bill. There is a concerted attack against every form of taxation in this bill, and not alone against this income tax, and when you get through with it you will find you have got no bill left if you indulge individual eccentricities and individual differences of opinion. The committee have worked and struggled hard with the greatest task that was ever before a legislative body. Do I like it? No. Would I make it this way? No. I voted for it in order to stand by a Democratic administration with a gigantic war to wage. Do not let your administration be destroyed by Democratic action. [Applause.]

Mr. KNUTSON. Do I understand the gentleman to say the President has stated that we were in this war for no special reason?

Mr. HILL. We can all read the papers. You can read them as well as I can.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. DILLON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time may be extended for two minutes. I want to ask him one question.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. DILLON. Can you tell us anything about the exemption on the English tax?

Mr. HILL. There is one exemption of $650, no distinction being made as to a married man or a single man. My impression is that there is an allowance, as the gentleman from New York [Mr. LUNN] stated yesterday, of $125 for each child. On our basis of exemption of $2,000 for a married man, we are practically making an exemption for a family of eight children.

Mr. DILLON. One other question. I have reference more particularly to the exemption of bonds. What exemptions of bonds do the English make in reference to the income tax?

Mr. HILL. They issued a loan there during the war, about a year ago, in two forms. I wish my friend from Tennessee [Mr. HULL] was here. He told me the other day the rate of interest was 4 per cent, tax free, and 5 per cent, as I remember it, with paying the taxes, and there was very little subscribed on the 4 per cent; but the great bulk of the issue was subscribed for on the basis of 5 per cent, not tax free. As a rule I do not think the Governments of Europe exempt war bonds from taxation.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan is recognized.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I do hope the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] will not be adopted. I have given a great deal of consideration to this matter as set forth in this bill. The additional 1 per cent normal tax recommended by the gentleman from Kentucky means from $80,000,000 to $100,000,000 additional tax upon individual incomes. Last year there were in the neighborhood of 225,000 to 250,000 people who paid a tax on those incomes below $7,500.

Mr. KEATING. Will the gentleman yield for a question for information?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. KEATING. When the gentleman says the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] will produce between $80,000,000 and $100,000,000, he means if the gentleman carries out his series of amendments? Is that the idea?

Mr. FORDNEY. No, sir. On the number of people who paid taxes last year under existing law means from $80,000,000 to $100,000,000 additional tax in this law.

Mr. KEATING. By this one amendment?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes; 1 per cent.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Running 1 per cent on the various grades all through the bill.

Mr. SHERLEY. If the gentleman will permit, an actuary of the Treasury Department figured if you carried 1 per cent—which is not my proposition, however—you would get about $26,000,000.

Mr. FORDNEY. Will the gentleman figure it out and come to me with the correct figures?

Mr. SHERLEY. I have got the figures.

Mr. FORDNEY. I will bet you dollars to doughnuts you do not have the figures when you say $26,000,000.

This bill does this, my friend. Under existing law there is a normal tax of 2 per cent on incomes.

Then there is a graduated surtax running up to 13 per cent, making a total of the normal and surtax combined of 15 per cent of income.

This bill provides for an additional 2 per cent normal tax and a graduated surtax running up to 33 per cent, making 35 per cent in all. As provided for in this bill, if it should be enacted into law as the figures are written here incomes above $500,000 will pay 50 per cent of the income in taxes. But the percentage of income, as I stated the other day, in both laws combined, no matter what the income may be, will never reach 50 per cent because of the lower rate paid on the lower income up to $500,000.

If this amendment offered by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] is adopted he will then, no doubt, carry out his plan of graduating the tax and adding more and more on up, according to the figures offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER] to 65 per cent on the total income.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. FORDNEY. If these rates are added to the rates fixed in this bill you are going to disarrange the whole system as provided for in this bill and you are going to tax the people with incomes beyond any bounds of reason.

Let me say to the gentlemen of the House, too, that it is estimated that the difference in the lowering of the exemptions from $3,000 to $1,000 for single people and from $4,000 to $2,000 for married people will add 4,000,000 additional taxpayers that did not pay taxes under the income-tax law last year.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. WINGO. What is the estimate of the amount of revenue that that will raise?

Mr. FORDNEY. From $80,000,000 to $100,000,000. The difference between the exemptions provided for in this bill, $1,000 and $2,000, and those in the existing law, $3,000 and $4,000, will yield to the Government, as estimated by the Treasury Department, from $80,000,000 to $100,000,000.

Mr. WINGO. Is that $80,000,000 or $100,000,000 in the table?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes, sir.

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. SLOAN. Would not the rearrangement of the rates of the income call for a rearrangement of the taxes placed on excessive profits if you would preserve the symmetry of this bill?

Mr. FORDNEY. Oh, yes.

Mr. SLOAN. As a matter of fact, it was a large problem for the committee to balance the two propositions?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes. It is estimated that the income tax as carried in this bill, from individuals, will yield $372,000,000 and from corporations $161,000,000. There is no comparison between our income laws and the income laws of England, because our system of taxes in this country is entirely different from the system of taxes in England. Prior to the war, in England a building unoccupied in a city paid no tax at all.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. I yield; yes.

Mr. TOWNER. You spoke about the 65 per cent under the schedule that you put in the RECORD of May 14. The RECORD, as you stated, says that there are only 122 persons who can pay taxes on over $450,000 income, so that the number of persons who would pay the 65 per cent that you speak of would be very small, would it not?

Mr. FORDNEY. Let me read it to the House. Seventy thousand people pay on the first rate, 59,000 persons in the next, and 120,000 persons in the next, or a total of about 250,000 people paying an income on less than $7,500.

Mr. TOWNER. That is very true; but you spoke about the 65 per cent. Sixty-five per cent, according to my schedule, would apply only to those who had an income of over $500,000.

Mr. FORDNEY. The income we are talking about is $5,000. It will catch a lot of people who have lower incomes, and it will work some hardship upon them. But I do not believe the lowering of the exemption to $1,000 is going to beggar any man under the terms of this bill, if it becomes a law. A single man will pay $20 on $2,000. Where is there a man with an income of $2,000 that can not pay $20 toward carrying on this war?

Gentlemen must remember that it will take a great many dollars to give the Government sufficient money to equip our soldiers to meet their enemy in the trenches on the fair and level. The American soldier boy is brave and is not afraid to meet his enemy on a fair footing, on equal terms; but to send your son to the trenches with a gun on his shoulder but with his cartridge box empty and with nothing to eat in his knapsack would not be a fair proposition.

This bill, if we will enact it into law, will raise more money than I think we ought to raise. But this morning I read in the Washington Post a statement of the amount of money to be appropriated for this war this year. It aggregated $3,390,000,000, itemized in that statement in this morning's paper—a much larger sum than I had any idea that the administration would need.

But, gentlemen, if we send our soldiers to Europe we must have ships to send them in. There is no other way for them to go. It is going to require a very large sum of money to build ships and equip them and convoy them safely, to guard against our boys filling a watery grave before they reach the shores of Europe. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. I will.

Mr. MADDEN. If we are going to build a lot of ships, would the gentleman levy taxes on the people to pay for building them, or would he issue securities?

Mr. FORDNEY. I have said that we should raise the larger percentage of money by bond sales and put the obligation to pay on future generations 40 years hence, when our country's population will be 250,000,000 people, at the present rate of increase in the population, based on our past history, from 200,000,000 to 250,000,000 people, to pay that debt. [Applause.] But, gentlemen, we are going to use a much larger sum of money than I had any idea of for this war, as set forth this morning in the newspapers. I do not care if it is $4,000,000,000, the people of this country can afford to do the right thing in equipping the Army and meeting this most formidable foe. We have taken a much greater contract than any man believed that we were taking on in my candid opinion.

I need not borrow trouble, gentlemen, but if Russia goes out of this war, O God! what a contract we have taken on. We have either got to send millions of men to Europe or back up. One of those two things is certain. But while we are preparing, some men, and unjustly, too—and I beg of them to retract their statements—have cast reflections on the rich men of the country. They have said, "Let the rich pay because their sons will stay at home and the sons of the poor man will fight this war." Oh, gentlemen, what a mistake you make. What an unjust criticism of the rich man that statement is. The rich man's son is just as patriotic as the poor man's son, and when the rich man gives up his son and all he has on this earth, his wealth along with his son, he certainly is doing his just and equitable share, the same as the poor man.

I have three sons. One has already enlisted. The other two have written me wanting to enlist. They both have families, and I have advised them to wait a little while and see how badly they may be needed. My youngest son, strong, able-bodied boy, had trouble in getting his enlistment. This morning I went with him to the Navy Department and succeeded in completing his application for entering this war. [Applause.] Oh, gentlemen, I love my children, I love my sons as much as any other man on God's earth loves his sons. I am 63 years of age and have worked hard all my life, but how willingly I will give up the last dollar that I have on this earth if God will send my boys safely back to my home. [Applause.]

Let us be just and equitable to all. We are all of one family, rich and poor. I wish I could see a better feeling between the rich and the poor. It is wrong to try to incite the poor man against the rich.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended 5 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FORDNEY. I would love to see a more friendly feeling between the rich and the poor. Where can you see a more beautiful sight than the rich man and the poor man sitting down together, brothers alike? It is a mistake to create a feeling of enmity between men in this country. Wealth can not succeed without the assistance of labor. I do not know how the rich man can do the poor man a greater favor than to give him employment when he needs it that he may furnish him purchasing power to buy bread and butter for his beloved wife and children. The poor man loves his family the same as any other man. Do not, gentlemen, again on the floor of this House attempt to besmirch the character and patriotism of a man of wealth, because there is no such division between the rich and the poor——

Mr. REAVIS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. REAVIS. I agree entirely with what the gentleman said about inciting antagonism between the rich and the poor, but it has been stated on the floor of the House repeatedly that if the tax on great incomes were increased the rich man would run to cover with his income rather than do the patriotic duty of paying the tax to the Government. That is an attack on the rich man.

Mr. FORDNEY. I have stated, and I repeat, there may be some excuse for a poor man doing a thing in violation of law, a dishonest thing, when his wife and children are hungry. If I to-day should hear my wife and my children crying for bread, although I profess to be an honest man, by the heavens above me, if the time comes when I am strong and able and willing to work and can not find work to do, you must teach your chickens to roost high or we will have potpie at my home. [Laughter and applause.] I would steal before I would let them starve.

I could, if I sat on a jury to try a man for stealing bread, excuse him, but there is no excuse for the rich man being a dishonest man. [Applause.] If a rich man steals money, not because he needs it, he does it because he is a natural thief. The poor man may steal because he is forced to it, as he thinks at least. Therefore I have stated, and I want to repeat, that there are dishonest men among both the rich and the poor. God has not perfected the brains of mankind so that all men are honest. I have stated, and let me say again that I believe to put the tax so high on the wealth of this country that they feel injured, some will evade the law if they can. It can be done in this way: A corporation that feels injured because of the income tax you put upon them can pass the surplus and use it as capital instead of paying dividends, and there is no law in this or any land compelling a corporation to pay a dividend to its stockholders.

Mr. REAVIS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. REAVIS. If they earned that money can not you collect an income tax on the revenue whether it has passed it to dividends or to surplus?

Mr. FORDNEY. Under existing law a corporation is permitted to use as capital their original cash paid in and the surplus or earnings, pass the surplus and use it as capital, and from that deduct the $5,000 exemption and 8 per cent on the capital and surplus used before paying excess-profits tax.

Mr. REAVIS. That is the excess-profits tax; but can they do it under the income tax? If they earned the money, it is income.

Mr. FORDNEY. Where do you get your income? Suppose you have stock in a bank and that bank earns 20 per cent on capital invested. Is there any law in the world that will compel the bank to pay more than, say, 5 or 6 per cent, or any sum, on the capital, but can pass the balance to surplus?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the gentleman have one minute more.

Mr. CANNON. I hope that he may have five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman from Michigan a question. If these corporations should do that thing which he now suggests, does not the gentleman think that when we convene again in December we will be able to devise some law that will not only reach that sum that should be paid but with penalties attached if they do it?

Mr. FORDNEY. Oh, it is within the power of Congress perhaps to do that; but let me justify what I have said now with the illustration of a man who is honestly passing his profits to surplus, because he finds it necessary to reinvest those profits instead of paying them out as a dividend. You can not reach that man, or if you could you would unjustly compel him to pay a dividend when he needs the surplus as capital. That would be a very difficult problem to handle.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. I want to state by way of foundation for the question that the great corporations with enormous capital have many stockholders. As I understand it, the total wealth of the United States is from $200,000,000,000 to $210,000,000,000 or $220,000,000,000.

Mr. FORDNEY. It is estimated to be $260,000,000,000 now.

Mr. CANNON. Very well. I see it stated, and I believe it to be true, that the plutocrats, so called, in the United States, with all their aggregate wealth, have not to exceed $10,000,000,000, which is ten thousand million dollars of wealth, and yet gentlemen on this floor orate and talk about this, that, and the other, when in the tide of time $260,000,000,000 never was so universally distributed through 110,000,000 people as it is at this time. [Applause.]

Mr. FORDNEY. Let me say to the gentleman in reply to that, that in 1860 the census of the United States showed the wealth in this country to be $16,000,000,000. In 1910, 50 years later, the wealth of the country was $188,000,000,000, or an increase in wealth in the United States in half a century of $172,000,000,000. It is estimated to-day that the wealth of the United States is $260,000,000,000, while Great Britain and Germany have been 500 years in accumulating a total wealth before the war of the two great nations of $164,000,000,000. Our wealth is greater, our wealth has accumulated in a greater sum in the last half century than the total wealth of those two great nations that have been 500 years accumulating. The people of this country are the wealthiest people in the world, and they are willing to pay. Let us distribute the tax justly and equably, and without prejudice or without discrimination. Let us avoid class legislation if possible. That thought is always uppermost in my mind, and I hope there is no man within the sound of my voice who will say or entertain the opinion that I have ever in all my life, while a Member of this House, voted for or against a law because of my personal interest, for I never have done so.

Mr. DOREMUS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. DOREMUS. My colleague has suggested a way by which corporations can escape the payment of an exorbitant tax by passing the money into their surplus. By Title VI of this bill you are attempting to raise some $200,000,000 by a tax of 5 per cent upon gross sales. Can a manufacturer who is taxed 5 per cent upon his gross sales escape that tax by passing the money to the credit of his surplus account?

Mr. MADDEN. Would he have any surplus?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to another question in connection with that?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Is it not true that under the income-tax law, the excess-profits tax law, when a corporation passes any profits to surplus taxes are paid upon that as profits?

Mr. FORDNEY. For the one year; yes.

Mr. MANN. It seems to me that that is like paying it on dividends. There is no distinction.

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes; paying a tax on that money passed to surplus; but he uses it the next year as capital and is permitted to deduct 8 per cent on the same as capital used.

Mr. MANN. But if it was paid to an individual the individual would pay upon it?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. MANN. There is no distinction whatever.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has again expired.

Mr. DOREMUS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time may be extended for another minute.
Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Make it five minutes.
Mr. DOREMUS. Very well.
The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?
There was no objection.
Mr. FORDNEY. Gentleman, what I want to say is this: I believe, after nearly one month's consideration by the members of the Ways and Means Committee of this bill, that we have recommended rates more nearly equitable and just to the institutions of the country than some man's brain can, upon the spur of the moment, suggest, and know the effect of his amendment. I appeal to you, gentlemen, to give careful consideration to the amendment now under consideration before you vote upon it and know its full effect.
Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?
Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.
Mr. McCORMICK. Under the provisions of the bill the individual who through his stockholdings pays an excess profits tax will be taxed again under the income-tax provisions, will he not?
Mr. FORDNEY. Why, yes. If a corporation pays all taxes up to the time the excess profits tax becomes due or deductable, then the 8 per cent or 16 per cent, as it is now proposed, will be deducted, and the balance divided among the stockholders and go to the individuals, and then that money is taxed when you get to the point where a supertax begins, and not until then.
Mr. McCORMICK. Precisely; and that leads to another question. Why did the committee prefer to doube the excess profits tax rather than seek to raise a like sum through a larger income tax? There are some of us who want light on that point.
Mr. FORDNEY. This 1 per cent on normal incomes, beginning at $5,000, amounts to more money in taxes than a 4 per cent excess profits tax will amount to, 20 per cent instead of 16 per cent excess profits tax. The difference of the 4 per cent gentlemen, will not amount to as much money as this 1 per cent normal tax will, beginning on incomes at $5,000 and running on up.
Mr. DOREMUS. Will the gentleman yield?
Mr. FORDNEY. I will.
Mr. DOREMUS. I do not care to press my colleague unduly——
Mr. FORDNEY. I did not finish my statement to the gentleman. I want to say this: I am now and have been, my friend, opposed to a tax upon gross sales of any man's products, because I believe that a tax on the gross sales is likely to take not only all of his profits but part of his original capital.
Mr. DOREMUS. The gentleman is right.
Mr. FORDNEY. In the automobile business—I would not have mentioned it if it had not been for my good friend——
Mr. DOREMUS. I did not mention it.
Mr. FORDNEY. Let me say this to you, that if there are a large number of small automobile factories that will be driven out of business by this 5 per cent tax on gross sales it has a tendency to create a monopoly, just what every man in this House is opposed to, because it makes it possible for the strong man to continue to do business and put out of business the little man who can not afford to pay the tax on his gross sales. [Applause.]
Mr. BATHRICK. Will the gentleman yield?
Mr. FORDNEY. I will yield if the gentleman will be brief.
Mr. BATHRICK. What seems to me strangely inequitable about this bill is this: A company having a large overcapitalization watered stock—the 8 per cent is figured on that watered stock?
Mr. FORDNEY. No; let me set the gentleman right. This bill provides that capital "actually invested"; that does not mean watered stock. For instance, I know of a firm—a sugar company, a refining company—whose representative testified before the Committee on Ways and Means that of a capital stock of $10,000,000 his firm had but $3,280,000 cash paid in and all the balance was water. The real actual cash paid in by that company is $3,280,000 and not $10,000,000, and they can not deduct 8 per cent of their income based on the par value of that stock because it is not worth its par. It is worth exactly what the cash paid in is, based not on the total stock issued by the company.
Mr. BATHRICK. I am very glad to receive the gentleman's explanation, but in seeking to cure the situation the gentleman has put the bill in a position so that it creates an inequitable condition in another case. For instance, takes a corporation that owns a building and it is rented, where it is receiving rentals. That is its business. The bill requires this: If the lot on which that building stands cost $10,000 20 years ago and the land is now worth $100,000, it would still ask them to figure 8 per cent on the $10,000.
Mr. FORDNEY. Not me, pardon me.
Mr. BATHRICK. Does the bill do it?
Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.
Mr. BATHRICK. That is an inequity.
Mr. LENROOT. Is not upon the value of the property?
Mr. FORDNEY. I do not like to discuss these things, because I discussed them very fully the other day. There to my mind is one of the inequities in the bill, but I fought that out and I have laid down, agreeing to stand by the majority. Amend the bill, if you will; I will be very glad to see you do it. I was whipped in the committee black and blue from head to heels because of these things, but I am a Roman and I said I would stand by the majority of the committee and I intend to do it. [Applause.]
Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Before the gentleman concludes I want to ask him one question.
Mr. FORDNEY. I yield to the gentleman.
Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Several amendments are to be offered to this income-tax provision, one by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY]. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER] has one, the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. KEATING] has one, and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH] has indicated that he proposes to offer one.
Mr. FORDNEY. All along the same line.
Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I want to ask the gentleman the blunt question, Whether, if any one of these amendments be adopted, it will not dislocate the whole financial arrangement of this bill?
Mr. FORDNEY. Oh, not only dislocate—I hardly know the proper word to use—but it will entirely put it out of joint. Does that explain it better? I do not want to see any of them adopted. They are all wrong, the bill is better as it is now. Gentlemen, I thank you. [Applause.]
Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto close in 20 minutes. I shall want 10 minutes of that time.
Mr. MASON. Mr. Chairman, I hope the gentleman will give opportunity for 5-minute discussions of amendments that have not yet been——
Mr. KITCHIN. This is just on the first paragraph, I will say to the gentleman.
Mr. MASON. My amendment, which I have offered, is a matter that has not been discussed and I have been waiting patiently to discuss the amendment.
Mr. KITCHIN. I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto close in 20 minutes. The gentleman from Illinois to have 5 minutes, the gentleman from Nebraska 5, and I to have 10 minutes.
The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. NEELY] has been seeking recognition.
Mr. KITCHIN. I will make it 25 minutes.
The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that at the end of 25 minutes all debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto close. Is there objection?
Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, do the amendments upon this paragraph carry with it amendments to the other paragraphs?
Mr. KITCHIN. Oh, no.
The CHAIRMAN. This is just one paragraph.
Mr. DOWELL. What I am inquiring about is: Does not this amendment affect each paragraph in the section?
Mr. KITCHIN. If this amendment is carried, the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] has given notice that he will offer as each paragraph is read an amendment increasing the rate.
Mr. DOWELL. Does not the other amendment affect this same paragraph?
Mr. KITCHIN. His other proposed amendment? His amendment will come after we reach the bottom of the section.
Mr. LONGWORTH. And there is the Towner amendment.
Mr. DOWELL. I understand you are going to cut off debate on the paragraph?
Mr. KITCHIN. And not on the section.
The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.
The gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. NEELY] is recognized.
Mr. NEELY. Mr. Chairman, Hon. W. E. Wells, of Newell, W. Va., head of the largest pottery in the world, and one of the richest and also one of the most patriotic men in my district, has written me a letter in which he has very ably expressed his views on the pending measure. In my opinion, Mr. Wells is entitled to the gratitude of this House for the position he has taken in regard the duty of the wealthy to pay taxes very generously during the continuance of the war. I ask that this letter be read from the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

THE HOMER LAUGHLIN CHINA CO.,
Newell, W. Va., April 20, 1917.

Maj. M. M. NEELY,
House Office Building, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MAJOR: The revenue measures that must be adopted by Congress to finance the war are a matter of grave concern to all engaged in corporate business, and it occurs to me that you may not be averse to an expression from your constituents.

Presumably a large percentage of the increased revenue that must be provided in the near future must be derived from the profits of individuals, partnerships, and corporations, and this is as it should be. The danger, as I see it, is that the Congress may yield to the pressure that will be brought to bear from some quarters to prevent an adequate increase. The country will assume a tremendous obligation, and unless provision is made to liquidate a considerable proportion by immediate special war taxes the burden upon the future of meeting the interest and retiring the principal will be overwhelming. It will constitute an endless problem for Congress, and will inevitably discourage the growth and development of industry in all lines.

The country is now incomparably richer than ever before, and, presumably, richer than it will be again during your time or mine. It is rich enough to pay as it goes, and while I may be extreme, I should like to see profits taxed high enough to pay at least half of the war bill within a year after the end of the war. Profits are now large, and a heavy tax on excess earnings of, say, all over 8 per cent on actual investment, will yield much more than it will in future years, and in the heat of patriotism will be paid more cheerfully than a much smaller tax later on. For my part, I should like to see the Government take 100 per cent of all profits over 8 per cent.

A small national debt is of little concern to the individual and need hardly be taken into account in the conduct of his business, but such an obligation as that now contemplated partakes of the character of a personal debt. It will hang over every man and his business like a mortgage unless provision is made to defray a large part of it as we go along. The average business man prefers to use his earnings to wipe out his debts before beginning to pay dividends, and I think Congress will be warranted in asking the business men of the Nation to handle this matter as they would a personal debt.

After the war the problem of retaining the world's markets we have recently acquired will become of supreme importance. The result will hinge largely upon the comparative cost of production here and abroad. The cost abroad will be enhanced by the scarcity of men and by the burden of a war debt. If we do escape a similar burden, our chances will be much improved. The discrepancy between production costs will be narrowed. A lower average tariff will equalize.

On the other hand, if our costs increase in proportion to those abroad we will lose an advantage that will never come again. Our industries, in their eagerness to retain their present hold on home and foreign markets, will put up a tremendous fight for higher duties. We shall have a renewal of the old, ugly tariff fight, but more bitter.

The exorbitant prices prevailing to-day on the products of our mills and factories are a national menace and need correction. In the face of a demand exceeding possible production any price will be—in most cases must be paid. Producers have lost their heads in the scramble for profits beyond their wildest dreams. Earnings of 100 per cent or more over cost of production are dangerously common. The extravagant cost of necessities is the result. All the advances that have been made in industrial wages do not equalize the increased living cost. The condition of the country is anomalous. After having as a Nation acquired tremendous wealth as the result of the war, the great mass of the people are worse off than they were before the war—a few thousand millionaires have been made. It does not require a prophet to see that this spells trouble for the future.

Congress may correct this by placing the tax on profits high enough. Obviously producers will not exact unwarranted prices if the added profit goes to the Government. A plan of this kind will to a large extent automatically control prices of food and other necessities. It should prove more effective than direct legislation to that end.

You perhaps know enough of my personal affairs and of those of the corporation I represent to realize that this suggestion is not a selfish one. We are the largest producers of pottery ware in the world and have been prosperous. If we were so inclined we might take advantage of the present market and largely increase earnings, but we have felt that somehow that would not be the patriotic thing to do. Our profits are, and have been, satisfactory, and we stand ready to give all or any part of them to the country for the duration of the war under any system of uniform taxation of earnings that may be adopted. We shall feel that the larger the rate of such taxation the less we shall have to worry about the future.

Very truly, yours, W. E. WELLS.

[Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MASON] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. MASON. Mr. Chairman, the amendment which I have to offer is not to this paragraph but to the section, and I do not care to take the time of the committee while we are considering this.

Mr. MANN. The debate is not closed except as to this paragraph.

Mr. MASON. Yes. I am not offering this to this paragraph. I will wait until I can offer it as an amendment to the section.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I exceedingly regret that such a level-headed and patriotic gentleman as the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. REAVIS] is so credulous as to be caught by this amendment that is offered by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY]. Let me assure him that this amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky does not mean that you are going to tax the wealth and the accumulated profits and the big incomes of the men whom the gentleman from Nebraska desires to reach and whom the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. KEATING] desires to reach, but it is in a way a heading off of the accomplishment of that purpose.

I do not say that the gentleman from Kentucky intended to attack this bill, but I do say that if he had had that intention he could not have done it more ingeniously than by this method. I do not say that the gentleman from Kentucky, by this amendment, intended to call forth an affirmative vote by men who are opposed to the whisky tax, or the rectified-whisky tax, or that he did it with the intention to gain the cooperation of the men who are opposed to the automobile tax, or to the tax on pleasure boats, or to the tax on jewelry, or to any other taxes in this bill. But if I myself were opposed to this proposition and wanted to defeat the levying of taxes to the extent of over $200,000,000 in this bill; if I had sat up night after night and studied the matter out, I never could have found a more ingenious way to defeat those taxes than by the introduction of such an amendment as has been offered by the gentleman from Kentucky.

He tells you that his object is not to raise $76,000,000 additional toward financing this war, but that his object and that of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MCCORMICK] and others, whose purpose was not to help the Government, was to help some people who are taxed in this bill.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. SHERLEY. I deny the correctness of that statement.

Mr. KITCHIN. Let me tell the gentleman what he said. I asked this question, "What do you intend to strike out of this bill by substituting this money that you will get from this increase of 1 per cent? What things will this increase of income tax replace?" And the gentleman said, "It will replace those proposed to be eliminated by the defeat of the increased rate on second-class mail matter."

Mr. MCCORMICK. Mr. Chairman, I deny that.

Mr. KITCHIN. I am talking about the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY]. And about an hour afterward the gentleman from Kentucky said it would take the place of part of these retroactive taxes, amounting to $108,000,000. Did not the gentleman from Kentucky say that?

Mr. SHERLEY. No; I did not say that.

Mr. KITCHIN. Well, that was the substance of it, was it not?

Mr. SHERLEY. I said I would rather tax this year's incomes by an increase of the income tax than to tax last year's incomes by a retroactive tax. I am not apologizing for that, and I am not demagoging about it.

Mr. KITCHIN. The gentleman said he was going to raise $76,000,000 by his proposed increases in the income tax.

Now, let me say to the gentleman from Kentucky and to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MCCORMICK], and others who are taking the same position, that if higher income-tax rates are agreed to it has been proposed to relieve the income-tax payers from the payment of the $108,000,000 additional income tax, levied upon their 1916 incomes to relieve the rectifiers of the whisky tax; to relieve those who will have to pay the billboard-advertising tax; to relieve the big magazines and newspapers from the payment of $19,000,000 tax for a service on which last year we lost about $90,000,000. The effect of all these proposals is to relieve some particular or special interests.

Ah, my friends, if they want to relieve some persons of this $76,000,000, why in the name of Heaven do they not want to give relief for the $77,500,000 which we are going to take from the freight payers of this country, the men who pay the freight on the flour and the shoes and the meat and the coal, because that is the people's relief? That relieves no special interest. That relieves the interests of all the people, and not the interests of one class. [Applause.]

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from North Carolina yield to the gentleman from Kentucky?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. SHERLEY. I suggest one. I suggest taking off your 10 per cent tax at the customhouse——

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I have shown this House what is the harm of this amendment——

Mr. SHERLEY. And I am not demagoging about it.

Mr. KITCHIN. Talk about demagoging! I will show you what this is.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. BURNETT. May we not, by adopting that, be relieved of the necessity of levying that minimum income tax on those poor fellows that would have to pay upon an income of $1,000 and an income of $2,000?

Mr. KITCHIN. That is passed by.

Mr. BURNETT. But the representatives of the people can do that.

Mr. KITCHIN. I am talking about what can be done on the floor of this House.

Yes; they want to relieve the newspapers and the magazines from this extra postage, the newspapers and the magazines that are costing the Government about $90,000,000—the newspapers and the magazines that the Government is paying a subsidy to the extent of about $90,000,000. Why in the name of common justice, why in the name of the common interests of all the people in this country do they not want to relieve the people of the increase in first-class postage upon which we are making $90,000,000 clear money? They do not want to relieve the people of the eighty or ninety million dollars exacted in this bill, but they want to relieve the newspapers and the magazines, the Saturday Evening Post, Collier's Weekly, the New York World, the New York Herald, and similar publications, which are compelling the people of this country to pay $90,000,000 by way of a subsidy.

Mr. SHERLEY. I beg to suggest to the gentleman that I said that I was in favor of increasing the rate on second-class matter but not in favor of the zone system.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman from Kentucky proposed to relieve the retroactive tax of 1916. Would or would not that relieve Mr. REAVIS's poor?

Mr. KITCHIN. No. Now, what is the reason for this proposal to increase the income-tax rates? It is an intentional, ingenious attack on the bill. You have not heard any man object to the tax levied upon the necessities of the people. You have heard them talk about automobiles and rectified whisky in this debate; you have heard them talk in this debate about billboard advertising; you have heard them talk about second-class postage and the magazines and the newspapers; you have heard them talk in this debate about cutting out the $108,000,000 income payable this year, but not one has intimated that he wants to take out the provisions that relieve the people generally.

Mr. LENROOT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. LENROOT. The gentleman is mistaken, absolutely mistaken, when he says that nobody had any suggestions about relieving the tax on the necessities of life. I was asked as to what I would favor taking the place, and I said I would take out the tax on freight and the tax on heat and light.

Mr. KITCHIN. I beg the pardon of the gentleman from Wisconsin. I did not know that he made a speech on it. I was out of the room at the time.

Mr. LITTLE. And the gentleman overlooked my little talk. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. KITCHIN. I am sorry I missed it, for I know it must have been a good one.

Now, let us see what tax this bill levies upon the smaller incomes, and I call the attention of the gentleman from Nebraska to this. On a $7,500 income of a married man the present tax is $70; the additional tax levied in the proposed bill is $135, making a total tax of $205, or almost three times the present tax, and yet the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] has offered an amendment to increase this tax to $230. Under the present law a married man having an income of $10,000 pays an income tax amounting to $120. Our proposed bill makes it $355, and Mr. SHERLEY makes it $405.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY].

Mr. KITCHIN. I ask that it be again reported.

The Clerk again reported the amendment, as follows:

On page 2, line 11, strike out "one" and insert the word "two."

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Six per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $20,000 and does not exceed $40,000.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I had intended to offer some amendments to this bill, beginning at this point, to increase the rate of percentage where the incomes are between twenty and forty thousand dollars, but the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. KEATING] offered his amendment, which covers all of the succeeding paragraphs. I shall therefore not offer the several amendments that I have prepared for these sections.

Now, I agree very heartily with what the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY] said about endeavoring to remove, if it is possible, in this country any feeling between the rich and the poor. If there ever was a time in the history of the Republic when this feeling should be thoroughly removed, this is the time. I was very much gratified when I found no complaint up to date reaching my desk from the very rich people in this country protesting against this great income tax.

Another very refreshing piece of mail came to your desk and to mine from men who have great incomes. The only complaint I have heard about the income tax is that it is too low, and that complaint comes from the rich. That marvelously well written and candid document, if you read it, shows that the rich of the country are willing that there should be a tax placed on their incomes.

Now, I take this position, that if you shall conscript the individual income while this war is going on over $100,000 and leave his original fortune alone that you do him no injury in his vested property rights. The only thing you do if he is earning a million dollars is to defer the investment of the $900,000 until after the war is over. Now, the property which he has accumulated the Government has protected. That is the property that the soldier will protect in this war. I also feel sure that the insinuation that there would be no incentive to the rich to keep their great business going on because their profits would be taken and given to this purpose is an insult to their patriotism, because if he is a patriotic citizen down in his heart, feeling that he is doing his country good, would be the greatest source of satisfaction to a man who wants to do the right thing in life. I believe he would be just as busy, just as active, just as earnest, in earning every dollar he could earn, even though he knew that it is going to pay the expenses of this war and help to save his Government.

So, in order that the time of the committee may not be taken up, I shall content myself with voting for the substitute offered by the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. KEATING] when it is offered.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Eight per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $40,000 and does not exceed $60,000.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend by striking out the word "eight" and inserting in lieu thereof the word "ten."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 3 line 4, strike out the word "eight" and insert the word "ten."

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, surely from this point on there ought not to be any objection to increasing the proposed rates of income tax by 25 per cent, which this amendment does in this item, and if this should be adopted I shall offer like amendments to the remaining items in the section, increasing this additional tax by 25 per cent. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] made a very ingenious argument upon the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY]. It was a persuasive argument to urge that this man or that man was in favor of increasing this income tax for the purpose of escaping the tax upon liquor or for the purpose of escaping the tax upon automobiles, or for this purpose or that purpose, but all the argument that the gentleman makes does not get away from the proposition that if this income tax is increased, as is proposed by my amendment, it will then be possible for this House to later on strike out the item of the bill which imposes a tax upon light and heat to every man, woman, and child in this country. [Applause.] His argument can not get away from the fact that if this amendment is now adopted we will be able to at least cut out a portion of the item in this bill relating to freight rates, which will impose a charge upon the bread that every family in the United States shall use during the continuation of the war.

The gentleman talks about these special interests, but the real interest that demands our attention is to make as little tax upon consumption, upon that which the average man must use to support himself and his family, as possible, and as large a tax as possible upon those who are best able to pay; and when you come to a tax upon an income of $40,000 to $60,000 a year and increase the surtax rate fixed in the bill by 25 per cent, thereby making it possible to be fair and just to the great mass of the people of the country, shall we say that because there is this interest or that interest that hopes, perchance, to get a reduction in some item in the bill, therefore we shall not do justice now? Who should make the money sacrifice to carry on this war—he who is best able to bear it or he who may be ruined and have to go into bankruptcy? No hardship can come to any man having an income of over $40,000 a year by adding 25 per cent more than is proposed in this bill; and I want to say to the gentleman from North Carolina that if this item is adopted now I predict that when we come to the item in relation to freight receipts, to the item in relation to heat and light, all that will go out of the bill, but it probably will not unless this income tax is raised, because it will then be the gentleman from North Carolina himself who will come down here and say that we have got to have this money and that we have got to impose this tax upon these poor people, because we need the money. Then the time will have gone by to provide that men receiving large incomes shall pay the tax without sacrifice upon their part and the men who are already paying more than their share will have to pay this, too. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. RAINEY) there were—ayes 84, noes 72.

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Chairman, I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered, and the Chair appointed Mr. LENROOT and Mr. RAINEY to act as tellers.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 98, noes 87.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. FOSTER, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 4280 and had come to no resolution thereon.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

By unanimous consent, Mr. POWERS was granted leave to withdraw from the files of the House, without leaving copies, papers in the case of William G. Pennington (H. R. 5513, 63d Cong.), no adverse report having been made thereon.

INCREASE OF THE MILITARY ESTABLISHMENT.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, I submit a conference report upon the bill (H. R. 3545) to temporarily increase the Military Establishment, and for other purposes, and I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration. The conferees have agreed to adopt the instructions that the House gave us to-day.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama presents a conference report upon the bill H. R. 3545, and asks unanimous consent for its present consideration, notwithstanding the rule about printing. Is there objection?

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object.

Mr. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, do I understand there are no other changes in the report?

Mr. DENT. The bill is as it was reported before, with the exception of the pay of the enlisted men, which has been changed, as we were instructed to do so by the House.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, do I understand the conferees have agreed to the amendment as adopted by the House this morning?

Mr. DENT. The conferees agreed to the Good amendment exactly as it was written.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will read the statement, without objection.

There was no objection.

The statement was read.

The conference report and statement are as follows:

CONFERENCE REPORT (NO. 53).

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 3545) to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States, having met, after full and further conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment insert the following:

"That in view of the existing emergency, which demands the raising of troops in addition to those now available, the President be, and he is hereby, authorized—

"First. Immediately to raise, organize, officer, and equip all or such number of increments of the Regular Army provided by the national defense act approved June 3, 1916, or such parts thereof as he may deem necessary; to raise all organizations of the Regular Army, including those added by such increments, to the maximum enlisted strength authorized by law. Vacancies in the Regular Army created or caused by the addition of increments as herein authorized which can not be filled by promotion may be filled by temporary appointment for the period of the emergency or until replaced by permanent appointments or by provisional appointments made under the provisions of section 23 of the national defense act, approved June 3, 1916, and hereafter provisional appointments under said section may be terminated whenever it is determined, in the manner prescribed by the President, that the officer has not the suitability and fitness requisite for permanent appointment.

"Second. To draft into the military service of the United States, organize, and officer, in accordance with the provisions of section 111 of said national defense act, so far as the provisions of said section may be applicable and not inconsistent with the terms of this act, any or all members of the National Guard and of the National Guard Reserves, and said members so drafted into the military service of the United States shall serve therein for the period of the existing emergency unless sooner discharged: Provided, That when so drafted the organizations or units of the National Guard shall, so far as practicable, retain the State designations of their respective organizations.

"Third. To raise by draft as herein provided, organize and equip an additional force of 500,000 enlisted men, or such part or parts thereof as he may at any time deem necessary, and to provide the necessary officers, line and staff, for said force and for organizations of the other forces hereby authorized, or by combining organizations of said other forces, by ordering members of the Officers' Reserve Corps to temporary duty in accordance with the provisions of section 38 of the national defense act approved June 3, 1916; by appointment from the Regular Army, the Officers' Reserve Corps, from those duly qualified and registered pursuant to section 23 of the act of Congress approved January 21, 1903 (32 Stat. L., p. 775), from the members of the National Guard drafted into the service of the United States, from those who have been graduated from educational institutions at which military instruction is compulsory, or from those who have had honorable service in the Regular Army, the National Guard, or in the Volunteer forces, or from the country at large; by assigning retired officers of the Regular Army to active duty with such force with their rank on the retired list and the full pay and allowances of their grade; or by the appointment of retired officers and enlisted men, active or retired, of the Regular Army as commissioned officers in such forces: Provided, That the organization of said force shall be the same as that of the corresponding organizations of the Regular Army: Provided further, That the President is authorized to increase or decrease the number of organizations prescribed for the typical brigades, divisions, or army corps of the Regular Army, and to prescribe such new and different organizations and personnel for army corps, divisions, brigades, regiments, battalions, squadrons, companies, troops, and batteries as the efficiency of the service may require: Provided further, That the number of organizations in a regiment shall not be increased nor shall the number of regiments be decreased: Provided further, That the President in his discretion may organize, officer, and equip for each Infantry and Cavalry brigade three machine-gun companies, and for each Infantry and Cavalry division four machine-gun companies, all in addition to the machine-gun companies comprised in organizations included in such brigades and divisions: Provided further, That the President in his discretion may organize for each division one armored motor car machine-gun company. The machine-gun companies organized under this section shall consist of such commissioned and enlisted personnel and be equipped in such manner as the President may prescribe: And provided further, That officers with rank not above that of colonel shall be appointed by the President alone, and officers above that grade by the President by and with the advice and consent of the Senate: Provided further, That the President may in his discretion recommission in the Coast Guard persons who have heretofore held commissions in the Revenue-Cutter Service or the Coast Guard and have left the service honorably, after ascertaining that they are qualified for service physically, morally, and as to age and military fitness.

"Fourth. The President is further authorized, in his discretion and at such time as he may determine, to raise and begin the training of an additional force of 500,000 men organized, officered, and equipped, as provided for the force first mentioned in the preceding paragraph of this section.

"Fifth. To raise by draft, organize, equip, and officer, as provided in the third paragraph of this section, in addition to and for each of the above forces, such recruit training units as he may deem necessary for the maintenance of such forces at the maximum strength.

"Sixth. To raise, organize, officer, and maintain during the emergency such number of ammunition batteries and battalions, depot batteries and battalions, and such artillery parks, with such numbers and grades of personnel as he may deem necessary. Such organizations shall be officered in the manner provided in the third paragraph of this section, and enlisted men may be assigned to said organizations from any of the forces herein provided for or raised by selective draft as by this act provided.

"Seventh. The President is further authorized to raise and maintain by voluntary enlistment, to organize, and equip, not to exceed four Infantry divisions, the officers of which shall be selected in the manner provided by paragraph 3 of section 1 of this act: Provided, That the organization of said force shall be the same as that of the corresponding organization of the Regular Army: And provided further, That there shall be no enlistments in said force of men under 25 years of age at time of enlisting: And provided further, That no such volunteer force shall be accepted in any unit smaller than a division.

"SEC. 2. That the enlisted men required to raise and maintain the organizations of the Regular Army and to complete and maintain the organizations embodying the members of the National Guard drafted into the service of the United States, at the maximum legal strength as by this act provided, shall be raised by voluntary enlistment, or if and whenever the President decides that they can not effectually be so raised or maintained, then by selective draft; and all other forces hereby authorized, except as provided in the seventh paragraph of section 1, shall be raised and maintained by selective draft exclusively; but this provision shall not prevent the transfer to any force of training cadres from other forces. Such draft as herein provided shall be based upon liability to military service of all male citizens, or male persons not alien enemies who have declared their intention to become citizens, between the ages of 21 and 30 years, both inclusive, and shall take place and be maintained under such regulations as the President may prescribe not inconsistent with the terms of this act. Quotas for the several States, Territories, and the District of Columbia, or subdivisions thereof, shall be determined in proportion to the population thereof, and credit shall be given to any State, Territory, District, or subdivision thereof, for the number of men who were in the military service of the United States as members of the National Guard on April 1, 1917, or who have since said date entered the military service of the United States from any such State, Territory, District, or subdivision, either as members of the Regular Army or the National Guard. All persons drafted into the service of the United States and all officers accepting commissions in the forces herein provided for shall, from the date of said draft or acceptance, be subject to the laws and regulations governing the Regular Army, except as to promotions, so far as such laws and regulations are applicable to persons whose permanent retention in the military service on the active or retired list is not contemplated by existing law, and those drafted shall be required to serve for the period of the existing emergency unless sooner discharged: Provided, That the President is authorized to raise and maintain by voluntary enlistment or draft, as herein provided, special and technical troops as he may deem necessary, and to embody them into organizations and to officer them as provided in the third paragraph of section 1 and section 9 of this act. Organizations of the forces herein provided for, except the Regular Army and the divisions authorized in the seventh paragraph of section 1, shall, as far as the interests of the service permit, be composed of men who come, and of officers who are appointed from, the same State or locality.

"SEC. 3. No bounty shall be paid to induce any person to enlist in the military service of the United States; and no person liable to military service shall hereafter be permitted or allowed to furnish a substitute for such service; nor shall any substitute be received, enlisted, or enrolled in the military service of the United States; and no such person shall be permitted to escape such service or to be discharged therefrom prior to the expiration of his term of service by the payment of money or any other valuable thing whatsoever as consideration for his release from military service or liability thereto.

"SEC. 4. That the Vice President of the United States, the officers, legislative, executive, and judicial, of the United States and of the several States, Territories, and the District of Columbia, regular or duly ordained ministers of religion, students who at the time of the approval of this act are preparing for the ministry in recognized theological or divinity schools, and all persons in the military and naval service of the United States shall be exempt from the selective draft herein prescribed; and nothing in this act contained shall be construed to require or compel any person to serve in any of the forces herein provided for who is found to be a member of any well-recognized religious sect or organization at present organized and existing and whose existing creed or principles forbid its members to participate in war in any form and whose religious convictions are against war or participation therein in accordance with the creed or principles of said religious organizations, but no person so exempted shall be exempted from service in any capacity that the President shall declare to be noncombatant; and the President is hereby authorized to exclude or discharge from said selective draft and from the draft under the second paragraph of section 1 hereof, or to draft for partial military service only from those liable to draft as in this act provided, persons of the following classes: County and municipal officials, customhouse clerks; persons employed by the United States in the transmission of the mails; artificers and workmen employed in the armories, arsenals, and navy yards of the United States, and such other persons employed in the service of the United States as the President may designate; pilots; mariners actually employed in the sea service of any citizen or merchant within the United States; persons engaged in industries, including agriculture, found to be necessary to the maintenance of the Military Establishment or the effective operation of the military forces or the maintenance of national interest during the emergency; those in a status with respect to persons dependent upon them for support which renders their exclusion or discharge advisable; and those found to be physically or morally deficient. No exemption or exclusion shall continue when a cause therefor no longer exists: Provided, That notwithstanding the exemptions enumerated herein, each State, Territory, and the District of Columbia shall be required to supply its quota in the proportion that its population bears to the total population of the United States.

"The President is hereby authorized, in his discretion, to create and establish throughout the several States and subdivisions thereof and in the Territories and the District of Columbia local boards, and where, in his discretion, practicable and desirable, there shall be created and established one such local board in each county or similar subdivision in each State, and one for approximately each 30,000 of population in each city of 30,000 population or over, according to the last census taken or estimates furnished by the Bureau of Census of the Department of Commerce. Such boards shall be appointed by the President, and shall consist of three or more members, none of whom shall be connected with the Military Establishment, to be chosen from among the local authorities of such subdivisions or from other citizens residing in the subdivision or area in which the respective boards will have jurisdiction under the rules and regulations prescribed by the President. Such boards shall have power within their respective jurisdictions to hear and determine, subject to review as hereinafter provided, all questions of exemption under this act, and all questions of or claims for including or discharging individuals or classes of individuals from the selective draft, which shall be made under rules and regulations prescribed by the President, except, any and every question or claim for including or excluding or discharging persons or classes of persons from the selective draft under the provisions of this act authorizing the President to exclude or discharge from the selective draft 'persons engaged in industries, including agriculture, found to be necessary to the maintenance of the Military Establishment, or the effective operation of the military forces, or the maintenance of national interest during the emergency.'

"The President is hereby authorized to establish additional boards, one in each Federal judicial district of the United States, consisting of such number of citizens, not connected with the Military Establishment, as the President may determine, who shall be appointed by the President. The President is hereby authorized, in his discretion, to establish more than one such board in any Federal judicial district of the United States, or to establish one such board having jurisdiction of an area extending into more than one Federal judicial district.

"Such district boards shall review on appeal and affirm, modify, or reverse any decision of any local board having jurisdiction in the area in which any such district board has jurisdiction under the rules and regulations prescribed by the President. Such district boards shall have exclusive original jurisdiction within their respective areas to hear and determine all questions or claims for including or excluding or discharging persons or classes of persons from the selective draft, under the provisions of this act, not included within the original jurisdiction of such local boards.

"The decisions of such district boards shall be final except that, in accordance with such rules and regulations as the President may prescribe, he may affirm, modify, or reverse any such decision.

"Any vacancy in any such local board or district board shall be filled by the President, and any member of any such local board or district board may be removed and another appointed in his place by the President, whenever he considers that the interest of the Nation demands it.

"The President shall make rules and regulations governing the organization and procedure of such local boards and district boards, and providing for and governing appeals from such local boards to such district boards, and reviews of the decisions of any local board by the district board having jurisdiction, and determining and prescribing the several areas in which the respective local boards and district boards shall have jurisdiction, and all other rules and regulations necessary to carry out the terms and provisions of this section, and shall provide for the issuance of certificates of exemption, or partial or limited exemptions, and for a system to exclude and discharge individuals from selective draft.

"SEC. 5. That all male persons between the ages of 21 and 30, both inclusive, shall be subject to registration in accordance with regulations to be prescribed by the President; and upon proclamation by the President or other public notice given by him or by his direction stating the time and place of such registration it shall be the duty of all persons of the designated ages, except officers and enlisted men of the Regular Army, the Navy, and the National Guard and Naval Militia while in the service of the United States, to present themselves for and submit to registration under the provisions of this act; and every such person shall be deemed to have notice of the requirements of this act upon the publication of said proclamation or other notice as aforesaid given by the President or by his direction; and any person who shall willfully fail or refuse to present himself for registration or to submit thereto as herein provided, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor and shall, upon conviction in the district court of the United States having jurisdiction thereof, be punished by imprisonment for not more than one year, and shall thereupon be duly registered: Provided, That in the call of the docket precedence shall be given, in courts trying the same, to the trial of criminal proceedings under this act: Provided further, That persons shall be subject to registration as herein provided who shall have attained their twenty-first birthday and who shall not have attained their thirty-first birthday on or before the day set for the registration, and all persons so registered shall be and remain subject to draft into the forces hereby authorized, unless exempted or excused therefrom as in this act provided: Provided further, That in the case of temporary absence from actual place of legal residence of any person liable to registration as provided herein such registration may be made by mail under regulations to be prescribed by the President.

"SEC. 6. That the President is hereby authorized to utilize the service of any or all departments and any or all officers or agents of the United States and of the several States, Territories, and the District of Columbia, and subdivisions thereof, in the execution of this act, and all officers and agents of the United States and of the several States, Territories, and subdivisions thereof, and of the District of Columbia, and all persons designated or appointed under regulations prescribed by the President whether such appointments are made by the President himself or by the governor or other officer of any State or Territory to perform any duty in the execution of this act, are hereby required to perform such duty as the President shall order or direct, and all such officers and agents and persons so designated or appointed shall hereby have full authority for all acts done by them in the execution of this act by the direction of the President. Correspondence in the execution of this act may be carried in penalty envelopes bearing the frank of the War Department. Any person charged as herein provided with the duty of carrying into effect any of the provisions of this act or the regulations made or directions given thereunder who shall fail or neglect to perform such duty; and any person charged with such duty or having and exercising any authority under said act, regulations, or directions, who shall knowingly make or be a party to the making of any false or incorrect registration, physical examination, exemption, enlistment, enrollment, or muster; and any person who shall make or be a party to the making of any false statement or certificate as to the fitness or liability of himself or any other person for service under the provisions of this act, or regulations made by the President thereunder, or otherwise evades or aids another to evade the requirements of this act or of said regulations, or who, in any manner, shall fail or neglect fully to perform any duty required of him in the execution of this act, shall, if not subject to military law, be guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction in the district court of the United States having jurisdiction thereof, be punished by imprisonment for not more than one year, or, if subject to military law, shall be tried by court-martial and suffer such punishment as a court-martial may direct.

"SEC. 7. That the qualifications and conditions for voluntary enlistment as herein provided shall be the same as those prescribed by existing law for enlistments in the Regular Army, except that recruits must be between the ages of 18 and 40 years, both inclusive, at the time of their enlistment; and such enlistments shall be for the period of the emergency unless sooner discharged. All enlistments, including those in the Regular Army Reserve, which are in force on the date of the approval of this act and which would terminate during the emergency shall continue in force during the emergency unless sooner discharged; but nothing herein contained shall be construed to shorten the period of any existing enlistment: Provided, That all persons enlisted or drafted under any of the provisions of this act shall as far as practicable be grouped into units by States and the political subdivisions of the same: Provided further, That all persons who have enlisted since April 1, 1917, either in the Regular Army or in the National Guard, and all persons who have enlisted in the National Guard since June 3, 1916, upon their application, shall be discharged upon the termination of the existing emergency.

"The President may provide for the discharge of any or all enlisted men whose status with respect to dependents renders such discharge advisable; and he may also authorize the employment on any active duty of retired enlisted men of the Regular Army, either with their rank on the retired list or in higher enlisted grades, and such retired enlisted men shall receive the full pay and allowances of the grades in which they are actively employed.

"SEC. 8. That the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, is authorized to appoint for the period of the existing emergency such general officers of appropriate grades as may be necessary for duty with brigades, divisions, and higher units in which the forces provided for herein may be organized by the President, and general officers of appropriate grade for the several Coast Artillery districts. In so far as such appointments may be made from any of the forces herein provided for, the appointees may be selected irrespective of the grades held by them in such forces. Vacancies in all grades in the Regular Army resulting from the appointment of officers thereof to higher grades in the forces other than the Regular Army herein provided for shall be filled by temporary promotions and appointments in the manner prescribed for filling temporary vacancies by section 114 of the national defense act approved June 3, 1916; and officers appointed under the provisions of this act to higher grades in the forces other than the Regular Army herein provided for shall not vacate their permanent commissions nor be prejudiced in their relative or lineal standing in the Regular Army.

"SEC. 9. That the appointments authorized and made as provided by the second, third, fourth, fifth, sixth, and seventh paragraphs of section 1 and by section 8 of this act, and the temporary appointments in the Regular Army authorized by the first paragraph of section 1 of this act, shall be for the period of the emergency, unless sooner terminated by discharge or otherwise. The President is hereby authorized to discharge any officer from the office held by him under such appointment for any cause which, in the judgment of the President, would promote the public service; and the general commanding any division and higher tactical organization or territorial department is authorized to appoint from time to time military boards of not less than three nor more than five officers of the forces herein provided for to examine into and report upon the capacity, qualification, conduct, and efficiency of any commissioned officer within his command other than officers of the Regular Army holding permanent or provisional commissions therein. Each member of such board shall be superior in rank to the officer whose qualifications are to be inquired into, and if the report of such board be adverse to the continuance of any such officer and be approved by the President, such officer shall be discharged from the service at the discretion of the President with one month's pay and allowances.

"SEC. 10. That all officers and enlisted men of the forces herein provided for other than the Regular Army shall be in all respects on the same footing as to pay, allowances, and pensions as officers and enlisted men of corresponding grades and length of service in the Regular Army; and commencing June 1, 1917, and continuing until the termination of the emergency, all enlisted men of the Army of the United States in active service whose base pay does not exceed $21 per month shall receive an increase of $15 per month; those whose base pay is $24, an increase of $12 per month; those whose base pay is $30, $36, or $40, an increase of $8 per month; and those whose base pay is $45 or more, an increase of $6 per month: Provided, That the increases of pay herein authorized shall not enter into the computation of continuous-service pay.

"SEC. 11. That all existing restrictions upon the detail, detachment, and employment of officers and enlisted men of the Regular Army are hereby suspended for the period of the present emergency.

"SEC. 12. That the President of the United States, as Commander in Chief of the Army, is authorized to make such regulations governing the prohibition of alcoholic liquors in or near military camps and to the officers and enlisted men of the Army as he may from time to time deem necessary or advisable: Provided, That no person, corporation, partnership, or association shall sell, supply, or have in his or its possession any intoxicating or spirituous liquors at any military station, cantonment, camp, fort, post, officers' or enlisted men's club, which is being used at the time for military purposes under this act, but the Secretary of War may make regulations permitting the sale and use of intoxicating liquors for medicinal purposes. It shall be unlawful to sell any intoxicating liquor, including beer, ale, or wine, to any officer or member of the military forces while in uniform, except as herein provided. Any person, corporation, partnership, or association violating the provisions of this section or the regulations made thereunder shall, unless otherwise punishable under the Articles of War, be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and be punished by a fine of not more than $1,000 or imprisonment for not more than 12 months, or both.

"SEC. 13. STATEMENT.

The managers on the part of the House at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 3545) to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States submit the following written statement explaining the effect of the action agreed on:

The bill as reported back is identically the same as the one reported in Report No. 49, Sixty-fifth Congress, first session, with the exception of the incorporation of the Senate provision, commonly known as the Roosevelt amendment, providing for four divisions to be raised under the volunteer system.

The managers call attention, however, to the fact that said printed report hereto referred to and made a part hereof is amended so as to make its provisions conform to the organization of said four divisions of volunteers.

On page 5 of the printed conference report after the word "draft" and before the quotation, beginning with the word "persons" and ending with the word "emergency," there should be no punctuation. The bill itself is so drawn and the mistake is made in the printed copy.

Almighty God, our lives are in Thy hands. In the order of Divine providence we are being brought out into a conflict in the world which tests the true and the false, the right and the wrong. We come with reverent purpose in heart before Thee asking that we may have the Divine guidance, that this great Nation of ours may stand for nothing that does not have the Divine approval, but that, being led by Thy spirit, we may work out a larger life for the world, and continue as an instrument in God's hands for the proclamation of the highest and the truest ideals for men. Forgive our personal and national sins. Keep our hearts from every evil purpose. Bring us by Thy truth into perfect conformity with Thy law. For Christ's sake. Amen.

Doc. No. 31), which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs and ordered to be printed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by J. C. South, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House agrees to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 3545) to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States.

The message also announced that the House disagrees to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 3330) to temporarily increase the commissioned and warrant and enlisted strength of the Navy and Marine Corps, and for other purposes, agrees to the conference asked for by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. PADGETT, Mr. TALBOTT, and Mr. BUTLER managers at the conference on the part of the House.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, immediately after the morning business I shall ask to have the conference report submitted to the Senate, and I shall ask for its adoption.

NEWSPAPER REPORTS OF PROCEEDINGS BEHIND CLOSED DOORS.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, the Senate yesterday spent about five hours in secret legislative session ostensibly for the purpose of discussing subjects the open discussion of which might be deleterious to the public interest. The morning Post utilizes three or four columns in giving a substantially accurate account of what occurred and the New York papers are quite as prolific in publishing similar information.

Mr. MYERS. May I ask the Senator a question? The Senator says the Post gave an accurate account of what occurred.

Mr. THOMAS. I said a substantially accurate account.

Mr. MYERS. Is not the Senator disclosing senatorial secrets when he says the report is accurate? Is he not verifying the newspaper report?

Mr. THOMAS. My purpose in rising is simply to refer to the fact that there are no such things as senatorial secrets. I have come to the conclusion that if Senators desire to occupy considerable space in the columns of the press or if it is necessary to give the public general information concerning matters of public concern, the best way to do so is to hold either an executive session or a secret legislative session. The extent to which information is afterwards given to the public is so graphically illustrated by the publication of the proceedings of yesterday that it seems to me the sooner we abandon the farce of secret legislative sessions the better it will be for us and for the whole country.

Mr. HARDWICK. I think at this time when the country is facing a foreign foe there is some necessity for enforcing our rule. The Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN], in charge of the espionage bill which has now gone to conference, I think, can remedy this situation if he will put in that report a provision that any newspapers which violate the confidence of either House of Congress by publishing its proceedings in secret session shall be barred from the mails. I am prepared for one to support such a proposition.

Mr. FALL. I want to object to the statement that there was published this morning an accurate account of what occurred here yesterday. I think if a punishment could be fixed for newspapers that did not publish an accurate account of what occurred here it would be more appropriate.

Mr. THOMAS. I will modify what I said by saying that the accounts were perhaps more accurate than those which are given of the proceedings in open session of the Senate.

Mr. NEW. Mr. President, I rose to make the point that the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL] has just made. I differ with the distinguished Senator from Colorado. All the accounts in the newspapers of this morning, as far as I have seen them, are full of inaccuracies. It is said in those papers that statements were made on this floor in executive session yesterday that were never made at all, at least if they were I did not hear them, and I was here during the whole of the executive session. It is said that the President was criticized in the Senate in a manner that he was not criticized at all. Nothing of the sort said to have been uttered was said by any Senator on the floor.

I think it is unfair to this body that statements of that kind should be disseminated over the country by the newspapers as they were this morning, and I rise to protest against such inaccurate statements being permitted to go unchallenged.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, whether the accounts are accurate or inaccurate, there is a very extensive publication of them. If the holding of executive sessions produces the inaccurate statements, columns and columns in length, that is all the more reason why, it seems to me, we might just as well abandon them. There is no possible way of correcting the statements that I know of. They have been published and have gone to the world, and it is impossible to get before the public that they were inaccurate or that they were accurate. So the harm is done just as much in one way as the other.

Mr. HARDWICK. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. FLETCHER. Certainly.

Mr. HARDWICK. In these times when we must have secret legislative sessions, does not the Senator think we ought to fix it so that the newspapers can not publish what purport to be the proceedings?

Mr. FLETCHER. I think it would be well to do something of that sort if it can be done; but I do not know that it is practicable to do it. The suggestion of the Senator from Georgia has considerable merit in it, it strikes me, but I do not know that it is feasible to do it at all. I think it is highly important that we should consider some of these matters in secret legislative session, but the way the matter works out we do not accomplish what we intended. How can we compel them?

Mr. HARDWICK. We can do it simply by providing that we will not permit any newspaper to circulate through the mails that publishes what purports to be the proceedings of a session of Congress in either House that are confidential. That is what we ought to do.

Mr. MYERS. May I say a word to the Senator from Georgia? I want to call his attention to the fact that the Senate has just gone on record in favor of the utmost freedom of the press, without any censorship.

Mr. HARDWICK. Ah, but, if the Senator will pardon me, that does not mean that when either House of Congress solemnly determines that in the interest of public safety publication ought not to be made of its proceedings we should allow the newspapers to make such publications.

Mr. MYERS. I think the action of Congress means that a newspaper can publish anything.

Mr. HARDWICK. If we take this other action, they will not be able to publish this sort of thing; and we ought to take it.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Regular order!

INCREASE OF MILITARY ESTABLISHMENT—CONFERENCE REPORT.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there further morning business? [A pause.] The morning business is closed.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I submit the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 3545) to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States, and I ask for its adoption.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Do Senators desire to have the conference report read in full? It has been printed, and is upon the desks of Senators.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I ask to have the conference report read, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the report.

The Secretary proceeded to read the conference report, and read as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 3545) to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment insert the following:

"That in view of the existing emergency, which demands the raising of troops in addition to those now available, the President be, and he is hereby, authorized—

"First. Immediately to raise, organize, officer, and equip all or such number of increments of the Regular Army provided by the national-defense act approved June 3, 1916, or such parts thereof as he may deem necessary; to raise all organizations of the Regular Army, including those added by such increments, to the maximum enlisted strength authorized by law. Vacancies in the Regular Army created or caused by the addition of increments as herein authorized which can not be filled by promotion may be filled by temporary appointment for the period of the emergency or until replaced by permanent appointments or by provisional appointments made under the provisions of section 23 of the national-defense act, approved June 3, 1916, and hereafter provisional appointments under said section may be terminated whenever it is determined, in the manner prescribed by the President, that the officer has not the suitability and fitness requisite for permanent appointment.

"Second. To draft into the military service of the United States, organize, and officer, in accordance with the provisions of section 111 of said national-defense act, so far as the provisions of said section may be applicable and not inconsistent with the terms of this act, any or all members of the National Guard and of the National Guard Reserves, and said members so drafted into the military service of the United States shall serve therein for the period of the existing emergency unless sooner discharged: Provided, That when so drafted the organizations or units of the National Guard shall, so far as practicable, retain the State designations of their respective organizations."

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, I desire to ask the Senator from Oregon to tell us what the National Guard Reserve is. That is a little outside of my line of information. The term is contained in the second paragraph of the conference report which the Secretary has been reading.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. There is a provision in the act for organizing recruiting units to fill the depletions that may exist in the organizations which are called into the service. That is the reserve from which we propose to fill the depleted ranks.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Then do I understand that there is authority to organize a reserve National Guard in the various States, to be under the jurisdiction of the State authorities until called into active service by the Federal authorities?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Yes, sir.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. And that under the law as it will stand if the conference report is adopted the National Guard Reserves may be called into the service without any further formality?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Yes. They are a part of the National Guard system.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. And that they are to be drafted into the military service of the United States, as are members of the National Guard?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Yes.

The Secretary resumed the reading of the conference report, and read as follows:

"Third. To raise by draft as herein provided, organize and equip an additional force of 500,000 enlisted men, or such part or parts thereof as he may at any time deem necessary, and to provide the necessary officers, line and staff, for said force and for organizations of the other forces hereby authorized, or by combining organizations of said other forces, by ordering members of the Officers' Reserve Corps to temporary duty in accordance with the provisions of section 38 of the national-defense act approved June 3, 1916; by appointment from the Regular Army, the Officers' Reserve Corps, from those duly qualified and registered pursuant to section 23 of the act of Congress approved January 21, 1903 (32 Stat. L., 775), from the members of the National Guard drafted into the service of the United States, from those who have been graduated from educational institutions at which military instruction is compulsory, or from those who have had honorable service in the Regular Army, the National Guard, or in the Volunteer forces, or from the country at large; by assigning retired officers of the Regular Army to active duty with such force with their rank on the retired list and the full pay and allowances of their grade; or by the appointment of retired officers and enlisted men, active or retired, of the Regular Army as commissioned officers in such forces: Provided, That the organization of said force shall be the same as that of the corresponding organizations of the Regular Army: Provided further, That the President is authorized to increase or decrease the number of organizations prescribed for the typical brigades, divisions, or army corps of the Regular Army, and to prescribe such new and different organizations and personnel for army corps, divisions, brigades, regiments, battalions, squadrons, companies, troops, and batteries as the efficiency of the service may require: Provided further, That the number of organizations in a regiment shall not be increased nor shall the number of regiments be decreased: Provided further, That the President in his discretion may organize, officer, and equip for each Infantry and Cavalry brigade three machine-gun companies, and for each Infantry and Cavalry division four machine-gun companies, all in addition to the machine-gun companies comprised in organizations included in such brigades and divisions: Provided further, That the President in his discretion may organize for each division one armored motor car machine-gun company. The machine-gun companies organized under this section shall consist of such commissioned and enlisted personnel and be equipped in such manner as the President may prescribe: And provided further, That officers with rank not above that of colonel shall be appointed by the President alone, and officers above that grade by the President by and with the advice and consent of the Senate: Provided further, That the President may in his discretion, recommission in the Coast Guard persons who have heretofore held commissions in the Revenue-Cutter Service or the Coast Guard and have left the service honorably, after ascertaining that they are qualified for service physically, morally, and as to age and military fitness.

"Fourth. The President is further authorized, in his discretion and at such time as he may determine, to raise and begin the training of an additional force of 500,000 men organized, officered, and equipped, as provided for the force first mentioned in the preceding paragraph of this section.

"Fifth. To raise by draft, organize, equip, and officer, as provided in the third paragraph of this section, in addition to and for each of the above forces, such recruit training units as he may deem necessary for the maintenance of such forces at the maximum strength.

"Sixth. To raise, organize, officer, and maintain during the emergency such number of ammunition batteries and battalions, depot batteries and battalions, and such artillery parks, with such numbers and grades of personnel as he may deem necessary. Such organizations shall be officered in the manner provided in the third paragraph of this section, and enlisted men may be assigned to said organizations from any of the forces herein provided for or raised by selective draft as by this act provided.

"Seventh. The President is further authorized to raise and maintain by voluntary enlistment, to organize, and equip, not to exceed four Infantry divisions, the officers of which shall be selected in the manner provided by paragraph 3 of section 1 of this act: Provided, That the organization of said force shall be the same as that of the corresponding organization of the Regular Army: And provided further, That there shall be no enlistments in said force of men under 25 years of age at time of enlisting: And provided further, That no such volunteer force shall be accepted in any unit smaller than a division.

"SEC. 2. That the enlisted men required to raise and maintain the organizations of the Regular Army and to complete and maintain the organizations embodying the members of the National Guard drafted into the service of the United States, at the maximum legal strength as by this act provided, shall be raised by voluntary enlistment, or if and whenever the President decides that they can not effectually be so raised or maintained, then by selective draft; and all other forces hereby authorized, except as provided in the seventh paragraph of section 1, shall be raised and maintained by selective draft exclusively; but this provision shall not prevent the transfer to any force of training cadres from other forces. Such draft as herein provided shall be based upon liability to military service of all male citizens, or male persons not alien enemies who have declared their intention to become citizens, between the ages of 21 and 30 years, both inclusive, and shall take place and be maintained under such regulations as the President may prescribe not inconsistent with the terms of this act. Quotas for the several States, Territories, and the District of Columbia, or subdivisions thereof, shall be determined in proportion to the population thereof, and credit shall be given to any State, Territory, District, or subdivision thereof, for the number of men who were in the military service of the United States as members of the National Guard on April 1, 1917, or who have since said date entered the military service of the United States from any such State, Territory, District, or subdivision, either as members of the Regular Army or the National Guard. All persons drafted into the service of the United States and all officers accepting commissions in the forces herein provided for shall, from the date of said draft or acceptance, be subject to the laws and regulations governing the Regular Army, except as to promotions, so far as such laws and regulations are applicable to persons whose permanent retention in the military service on the active or retired list is not contemplated by existing law, and those drafted shall be required to serve for the period of the existing emergency unless sooner discharged: Provided, That the President is authorized to raise and maintain by voluntary enlistment or draft, as herein provided, special and technical troops as he may deem necessary, and to embody them into organizations and to officer them as provided in the third paragraph of section 1 and section 9 of this act. Organizations of the forces herein provided for, except the Regular Army and the divisions authorized in the seventh paragraph of section 1, shall, as far as the interests of the service permit, be composed of men who come, and of officers who are appointed from, the same State or locality."

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Oregon another question? On page 4 I notice that there is a provision—

That officers with rank not above that of colonel shall be appointed by the President alone.

I suppose that means without the advice and consent of the Senate. Have we not been in the habit of requiring such appointments to be approved by the Senate?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Does the Senator refer to appointments not above the rank of colonel?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Yes.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. They have always been sent to the Senate heretofore. Would not the President have the power to make ad interim appointments if the confirming power were still left in the Senate? I do not understand why the Senate should be eliminated from that part of our constitutional duty.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Certainly.

Mr. KNOX. I was just about to ask the question that the Senator from Michigan has asked of the Senator from Oregon; but I want to suggest this idea: Is this in accordance with any precedent in time of war? Of course, the Constitution is perfectly clear that the Congress may empower the President alone to appoint inferior officers, and therefore there would be no doubt, in my judgment, as to the constitutionality of this provision; but what I should like to know is what the custom has been in the past as to officers below the rank of colonel?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Let me say to the Senator that I have never had occasion to look into the precedents. This power is only given to the President as to those officers below the rank of colonel, in order to make the Army as effective as possible and to allow changes to be made whenever and as often as they become necessary.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I can not hear the Senator.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. It must have been, then, for one of two reasons—either because these places could not otherwise be filled during the vacation of Congress or when the Senate was not in session, or the Executive wants to make these appointments without reference to the power of the Senate to confirm. I had supposed that the ad interim power would give the President all the latitude that was required to make these appointments during vacation.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, there is such a buzzing in the Chamber that I can not quite hear what the Senator is saying, and I have changed my seat three times to try to hear. I wish the Senator would speak so that we can hear him.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I do not know that I ought to take the time even to say what I have said, but there is a provision at the bottom of page 4 of the conference report—

> That officers with rank not above that of colonel shall be appointed by the President alone.

In other words, without the advice and consent of the Senate. If that is necessary in order to get prompt action, I am not unwilling to trust the Commander in Chief, upon whom this responsibility rests, to take such course as he may deem necessary, but the Senate has hitherto guarded with considerable solicitude its right to pass upon such appointments, and I know of no reason why it should not be done in this instance. If the power to make ad interim appointments during the vacation of the Senate exists as to such appointments, why, there should be no embarrassment about the matter at all.

I do not know that I am sufficiently interested to say anything more about it; but gradually the Senate is, willingly or unwillingly, abdicating its constitutional functions. We are not expected to spend very much time discussing any measure that comes to us from a department, and I do not know but that may be the way to enter upon the task with which we are now confronted; but it has not been the custom, nor has it hitherto been the habit, of the Senate to yield this power, and I know of no reason why we should not pass upon these appointments in the usual and customary way.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator that I do not know of any reason for it except to avoid the delays incident to having these confirmations made; but there is nothing to prevent the President from making——

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I can not hear the chairman of the committee. I wish he would talk so that we can hear him, and speak a little louder.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The President has power to make ad interim appointments. I think there is no question about that; but this provision is just as it passed the Senate the other day. There has been no change made by either the House or the Senate with respect to that particular provision.

There is one thing I want to say to the Senator while I am on my feet. I was not paying strict attention to the reading of the bill at the time the Senator from Michigan asked me a question awhile ago about the National Guard Reserve. I did not note what particular portion of the bill was being read, and I had in mind the recruiting units, and that was what my answer applied to.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. That is not what I referred to and what led to this discussion.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Later I realized that I had probably misunderstood the request of the Senator for information. The National Guard Reserve is provided for by the national-defense act of June 3, 1916. Those who have served out a part of their enlistment go into the National Guard Reserve, just as those who are in the enlisted personnel of the Army, after three years of service, go into the reserve. I call the Senator's attention to section 78 of the national-defense act of June 3, 1916.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I am very familiar with that act; but the National Guard Reserve that is now being formed in various States is being formed without any reference whatever to age or military experience. It seems to be a place where almost any patriot can enter and become enrolled for State service only; and I do not desire by that statement to seem to criticize it. In fact, I favor it.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. That is not the National Guard Reserve. They have home guards, and they have every form of establishment, in the different States; but those are not any part either of the Regular Army Reserve or of the National Guard Reserve.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Does the Senator mean that they have an age qualification?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. In what?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. In the National Guard of the States.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Oh yes. The enlistment ages in the National Guard are between 18 and 45.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I am thinking of what is known as the State Guard that is being organized in a number of the States under the immediate direction of the governor.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. There is no legislation that affects these so-called home guards or State guards, as the case may be. This legislation affects the National Guard, the National Guard Reserve, the Regular Army, and the Regular Army Reserve.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Going to the other point which I made, I notice that whenever the Senate passes and sends over to the House of Representatives a bill which provides for the creation of officers and the manner of their appointment, unless the bill is safeguarded with our right to confirm the appointee it is not safeguarded at all. It seems to me that it is a privilege that ought not to be lightly waived. I would not make that observation if it depended upon the Senate being in session in order to make such appointments as are provided for in this bill, but the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN], the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, and the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX] both admit that the power of ad interim appointment resides in the executive department for these particular officers, and I think they should be confirmed. I do not think it should be waived. The Committee on Naval Affairs, which recently reported the bill passed yesterday, met the same situation and very promptly remedied it, and provided that the new officers created under the act should be named by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate.

I am no special stickler for form, but we thunder loudly in the index when our prerogatives are seemingly encroached upon, and here is a plain case of avoidance without any necessity at all.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President, I do not wish anyone to infer from the question I asked that I have any hostility toward this provision in the law. I only wanted to know if it happened to lie in the knowledge of the chairman of the Military Affairs Committee or of anyone else whether that had been the custom in any previous wars.

I infer, of course, that this is a matter of convenience. I am told that there will be possibly some 30,000 officers below the rank of colonel to be appointed, and appointed almost at once. Of course that would throw on the Senate a burden that it would be almost impossible to bear, and a duty that it could hardly intelligently discharge, with the other duties that are cast upon it.

I am highly in favor of the provision. I think it is a wise provision, for the sake of economy of time and for convenience. My only purpose was to know whether it was buttressed by the precedents of previous wars.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, will the Senator from Pennsylvania permit me to ask him whether he feels that the President has abundant power to make these appointments ad interim, even with the usual provision?

Mr. KNOX. There is not any doubt whatever about that, Mr. President; but it is equally true that the Constitution provides for just such a situation as the country is confronted with now; that is, while the Constitution vests in the President the power to make appointments which are to be confirmed by the Senate, it distinctly provides that in respect to minor offices the Congress may delegate that power to the President alone, so that it is not necessary to encumber the Senate with the detail of appointments to the smaller offices.

The Secretary resumed the reading of the report, and read as follows:

"SEC. 3. No bounty shall be paid to induce any person to enlist in the military service of the United States; and no person liable to military service shall hereafter be permitted or allowed to furnish a substitute for such service; nor shall any substitute be received, enlisted, or enrolled in the military service of the United States; and no such person shall be permitted to escape such service or to be discharged therefrom prior to the expiration of his term of service by the payment of money or any other valuable thing whatsoever as consideration for his release from military service or liability thereto.

"SEC. 4. That the Vice President of the United States, the officers, legislative, executive, and judicial, of the United States and of the several States, Territories, and the District of Columbia, regular or duly ordained ministers of religion, students who at the time of the approval of this act are preparing for the ministry in recognized theological or divinity schools, and all persons in the military and naval service of the United States shall be exempt from the selective draft herein prescribed; and nothing in this act contained shall be construed to require or compel any person to serve in any of the forces herein provided for who is found to be a member of any well-recognized religious sect or organization at present organized and existing and whose existing creed or principles forbid its members to participate in war in any form and whose religious convictions are against war or participation therein in accordance with the creed or principles of said religious organizations, but no person so exempted shall be exempted from service in any capacity that the President shall declare to be noncombatant; and the President is hereby authorized to exclude or discharge from said selective draft and from the draft under the second paragraph of section 1 hereof, or to draft for partial military service only from those liable to draft as in this act provided, persons of the following classes: County and municipal officials; customhouse clerks; persons employed by the United States in the transmission of the mails; artificers and workmen employed in the armories, arsenals, and navy yards of the United States, and such other persons employed in the service of the United States as the President may designate; pilots; mariners actually employed in the sea service of any citizen or merchant within the United States; persons engaged in industries, including agriculture, found to be necessary to the maintenance of the Military Establishment or the effective operation of the military forces or the maintenance of national interest during the emergency; those in a status with respect to persons dependent upon them for support which renders their exclusion or discharge advisable; and those found to be physically or morally deficient. No exemption or exclusion shall continue when a cause therefor no longer exists: Provided, That notwithstanding the exemptions enumerated herein, each State, Territory, and the District of Columbia shall be required to supply its quota in the proportion that its population bears to the total population of the United States.

"The President is hereby authorized, in his discretion, to create and establish throughout the several States and subdivisions thereof and in the Territories and the District of Columbia local boards, and where, in his discretion, practicable and desirable, there shall be created and established one such local board in each county or similar subdivision in each State, and one for approximately each 30,000 of population in each city of 30,000 population or over, according to the last census taken or estimates furnished by the Bureau of Census of the Department of Commerce. Such boards shall be appointed by the President, and shall consist of three or more members, none of whom shall be connected with the Military Establishment, to be chosen from among the local authorities of such subdivisions or from other citizens residing in the subdivision or area in which the respective boards will have jurisdiction under the rules and regulations prescribed by the President. Such boards shall have power within their respective jurisdictions to hear and determine, subject to review as hereinafter provided, all questions of exemption under this act, and all questions of or claims for including or discharging individuals or classes of individuals from the selective draft, which shall be made under rules and regulations prescribed by the President, except, any and every question or claim for including or excluding or discharging persons or classes of persons from the selective draft under the provisions of this act authorizing the President to exclude or discharge from the selective draft 'persons engaged in industries, including agriculture, found to be necessary to the maintenance of the Military Establishment, or the effective operation of the military forces, or the maintenance of national interest during the emergency.'"

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I desire to ask the chairman of the committee if the part that has just been read is the text of the Senate bill?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The fundamental is the same as the Senate bill, although the phraseology has been somewhat changed.

Mr. REED. Why is it that this bill is not printed so that we can have, either by the type, or parallel columns, or in some other way, the benefit of the comparison?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I do not suppose there has ever been a bill printed as often as this has been. I have brought this bill out of the Senate committee informally a number of times, when it was not due here, in order to have it printed in the RECORD, so that the Senators could see it. It is printed now and before the Senate in advance of the papers coming over from the House. The Senator has a copy of it on his desk now, so that we have certainly done all in our power to bring it to the attention of the Senate.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I think the Senator must have misapprehended my question. I am not criticizing anybody; but I was asking why this conference report might not have been printed in such form that the Senate text would have appeared in one kind of type and the changes in another kind of type, so that as we study it we could tell what had been done by the conferees without going back to a comparison.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I will say to the Senator that that might have been done, but it was not suggested that it be printed in that form. It could have been done.

Mr. REED. It simply compels everybody to do a great deal of work in the way of comparison. This language seemed to me to be new. My recollection of the bill seemed to lead to the conclusion that there had been a good deal of change.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I will say to the Senator that we had a harder time to agree on that section, I believe, than anything else. It was worked over a number of times by the chairman of the House committee, and, in connection with officers from the Judge Advocate General's Office, we had numerous consultations before we could get it in a shape that all could agree on; but it does change the Senate provision somewhat.

Mr. REED. I suppose there will be nothing for us to do except to take those provisions and compare them ourselves, which will take some time.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, may I ask the chairman of the committee in reference to section 8a, which provides that the service of all persons selected by draft shall terminate at the end of the war? That provision was agreed to by both Houses, but seems to have been left out of the bill, if I am correct about it.

I am laboring under the same difficulty that the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] has just stated, because of the print. It may be in some other part of the bill that I have not examined. Will the Senator kindly state whether or not section 8a is in the present bill as reported out of conference?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. It is not. It was inserted in the bill on the floor of the Senate. It was never acted upon by the House at all.

Mr. McKELLAR. I have here before me a bill which passed the House of Representatives—well, I believe that was printed with amendments.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I think the Senator will find that that is a Senate amendment.

Mr. McKELLAR. That may be a Senate amendment. At all events; it is left out of the present bill?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Yes, sir.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I was unable to comprehend exactly what the Senator from Oregon said. Does it amount to this, that the provision in the bill that the enlistment in the service terminates with the war has been stricken from this bill?

Mr. McKELLAR. It has been stricken from the bill. I will read the Senator the provision in the bill as it passed the Senate. On page 29 of the original print of the bill as it passed the Senate is the following:

That the service of all persons selected by draft under the provisions of this act shall be for the period of the war unless sooner terminated by discharge or otherwise. Whenever said war shall cease by the conclusion of peace between the United States and its enemies in the present war, the President shall so declare by a public proclamation to that effect, and from and after the date of said proclamation the provisions of this act, in so far as they authorize compulsory service by selective draft or otherwise, shall cease to be in force and effect.

I recall that that was one of the provisions of which I thought very highly in the bill as it passed the Senate, and in looking over the present conference report that seems not to be in the bill as reported by the conferees.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. What is the limitation of the service, then, under this draft?

Mr. McKELLAR. It seems to be not limited. It is made a general law. I am not sure what these changes mean.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. If the Senator is right, I hope we will send this report back, because the bill never could have passed the Senate except with that limitation.

Mr. McKELLAR. I will say to the Senator from Georgia that I feel exactly the same way about it—that the service ought to be limited to the period of the war—and I was very glad indeed that the Senate kept that provision in, or put it in.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President——

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield to the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Let me ask the Senator from Tennessee if the provision beginning with line 15, on page 2, and ending on line 20, page 2, has the effect of doing what the Senator has in mind?

Mr. McKELLAR. That applies to the National Guard only, as I recall. I will ask the chairman of the committee if the effect of leaving out subsection (a) of section 8 is not to leave out the provision about the enlistment being for the period of the war?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Absolutely not.

Mr. McKELLAR. I shall be very glad if the Senator will explain that.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. This whole bill, Mr. President——

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President——

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, we can not hear what is being said. It is impossible. Some of us are interested in this matter, and it is absolutely impossible, because of audible conversation and noise in the Chamber, to understand a word that is being said.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair quit, several days ago, trying to maintain any order.

Mr. McKELLAR. So that the chairman may understand exactly what my inquiry is—and it is a mere inquiry—I will repeat my question: I see, by referring to the present report, that there is a limitation during the war on the National Guard, and probably on some other troops, but that there seems to be no limitation on those drafted into the service? In other words, so far as those drafted into the service are concerned, their service does not end with the close of the war. That is the way it looks to me. I am just asking the Senator if I am right about that. I will be glad to have him explain it.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The whole bill is framed on the theory that these provisions are only temporary in character, that the whole business ends with this emergency. If the Senator will look at page 7, the last line at the bottom, he will find the question he has raised answered; that "those drafted shall be required to serve for the period of the existing emergency unless sooner discharged." That applies to the whole force. The preceding section mentions the National Guard. So all the forces raised under this act will be discharged at the end of the emergency.

Mr. McKELLAR. I will say to the Senator that seems to cover that proposition. But I should like to ask the Senator why was subsection (a) stricken out? Why not let it be absolutely certain and beyond question of cavil or interpretation that this force is to serve during the war? In other words, why was subsection (a) left out?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The Senator has been in conferences and he knows that sometimes the members can not have their own way. This bill was for weeks discussed in conference, and it was difficult to reach an agreement among the members of the conference. With reference to that particular amendment, I do not believe that the House conferees or the Senate conferees felt that it was necessary, because the bill itself covered it. In terms, in other words, the whole bill read together shows that the troops are to be maintained only during the emergency. Now, if that section is adopted, I will say to the Senator, just the moment the war closes the whole Army would be disbanded, without any time to muster them out and to prepare the records which are necessary for future reference by the War Department. The Senator knows that in the Civil War it took some weeks and months to discharge the troops, and even now we are seeking all the time to amend the records of soldiers. So the section would have the effect of disbanding the Army without any power on the part of the Government to hold it long enough to make the proper records.

Mr. McKELLAR. I think, if the Senator will examine subsection (a), it provided for that very contingency. In other words, it remained with the President to declare by proclamation that the matter was entirely over before there could be a disbandment of the Army. All I want to say is that I am much interested in having the provision remain, and regret that it was left out, and that the service of this force that is drafted, as well as the National Guard, shall terminate with the end of the war. If it is already provided by the bill, that is entirely satisfactory to me, for that is all I desire in the matter.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President——

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. HARDWICK. I thought the Senator was through.

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield the floor to the Senator.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Georgia.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, I want to make a statement of this matter. The trouble about this matter is that what the Senator from Oregon claims is accomplished by this provision is not necessarily accomplished by it. In the Senate bill, in a dozen places, where the words "during the existing emergency" occurred the Senate by unanimous consent, with the concurrence of the Senator from Oregon, struck out the word "emergency" and substituted the word "war." In other words, we were drafting troops for this German "war" and not for some vague indefinite thing called an "emergency."

Now, we were willing—at least those who supported the bill were willing—to impose certain burdens upon our people during this war, not during some vague, indefinite, uncertain time called an emergency, which might be a matter of construction, and which is a more or less elastic term. We thought, and the Senator from Oregon agreed with us, that the safest thing to do was to say exactly what everybody contended it meant, which was the German war, not an emergency.

Now, I should like to know why the unanimous enactment of the Senate substituting the word "war" for "emergency" has been rescinded. I can not believe that the House of Representatives would not agree to that if it were urged in conference.

Mr. WARREN. If the Senator will allow me, there was no discussion, as I remember it, over the matter when the word "emergency" was changed to "war."

Mr. HARDWICK. The Senator is mistaken.

Mr. WARREN. I was on the floor and thought I had watched the debate closely.

Mr. HARDWICK. With all deference to the Senator, he is mistaken. I discussed it myself. I brought it up and made substantially the same statement and argument I am making now.

Mr. WARREN. When the Senator says it was determined after discussion, he is mistaken, or I am, because at the time, near the close of the bill, the idea was to let it and sundry other matters go to conference for settlement there if there was any possible question about it.

Mr. HARDWICK. If the Senator will pardon me——

Mr. WARREN. Will the Senator allow me. When we meet the House in conference and the House conferees insist on "emergency" rather than "war," and in our estimation it means one and the same, what are we going to do? Are we going to hold out against the House conferees to the extent of final disagreement?

Mr. HARDWICK. Against the practice mentioned by the Senator from Wyoming I protest here and now.

Mr. FALL. Will the Senator permit an inquiry? I should like to ask members of the conference if that word was not placed in there at the request of the Judge Advocate General?

Mr. WARREN. If the Senator addresses me, I have no remembrance that it was.

Mr. FALL. It is so understood, so that there might be a legal question hereafter as to when the troops should be mustered out.

Mr. HARDWICK. Against the legislative practice referred to by the Senator from Wyoming I want to enter my emphatic protest here and now. The Senator said that the amendment was made by agreement; that the idea was merely to take it to conference. I do not so understand the action of the Senate. I explained to the Senate at the time, and if the Senator from Wyoming was here he heard it, exactly why I urged the change, and the Senator from Oregon agreed that I was right. He agreed that the language should have no other meaning except that, and by unanimous consent the Senate put it in. Then we are informed, "Oh, well, that amounted to nothing; we were merely taking it to conference."

Mr. WARREN. Does the Senator understand that when a bill goes to conference one section or item in disagreement is stronger than the others and that it is not subject to change?

Mr. HARDWICK. The Senator from Georgia understands that when a bill goes to conference the conferees on the part of the Senate are required to enter into a real battle for the Senate provision.

Mr. WARREN. Does the Senator believe that there was no such battle in conference?

Mr. HARDWICK. I doubt it from the Senator's statement, if he wants me to be candid.

Mr. WARREN. Does the Senator mean to say that the conferees on the part of the Senate have been easy and had no battle?

Mr. HARDWICK. Of course, I judged simply by the Senator's remarks. I have no other way of judging.

Mr. WARREN. If the Senator wants to say that the conferees have been easy and had no battle——

Mr. HARDWICK. Does the Senator mean that the Senate conferees made a real fight for this provision?

Mr. WARREN. Certainly, for all the provisions.

Mr. HARDWICK. Did you make a real, obstinate stand for this provision?

Mr. WARREN. The Senator from Georgia may have a different estimation of a battle from what I have. There was no dirk knife or revolver in the business, I will state to the Senator.

Mr. HARDWICK. The Senator from Wyoming lives farther west than I do and may know more about such things than I do, but a real fight is what we had a right to expect from our conferees on this matter.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. May I interrupt the Senator for a moment?

Mr. HARDWICK. Let me finish. I protest against adopting amendments which are accepted merely to be carried to conference. The Senate knew what it was doing. The matter was explained to the Senate, and if the Senator from Wyoming was in the Chamber he must have heard the explanation I made on this floor, and almost in this spot, and almost in the words I have made it to-day. If the Senator from Wyoming then opposed it, he kept silent. The Senator from Oregon, the manager of the bill, immediately conceded the point and said the language meant the war, no more than that and no less than that. I then said if that is true, why have any trouble by using a doubtful term? Why not say "war" instead of using a more indefinite term?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. May I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. HARDWICK. Certainly.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The Senator is correct about my attitude with reference to this matter when the amendment was suggested by him. I told him I would look it over carefully and indicated the places where the word "emergency" occurred and where the word "war" would be substituted. I took the bill into the committee room and looked it over. I could not do it very well on the floor. I did not see the difference then and I do not see now that there is a difference between the terms, whether we use "emergency" or whether we use "war." I assented readily to the use of the word "war" instead of the word "emergency."

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

Mr. HARDWICK. I yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. REED. Before the chairman of the committee takes his seat, because I want to present the matter to him as well as to the Senator from Georgia, it seems to me as a matter of recollection—and I am speaking purely now as a matter of recollection—that after the bill had been amended by changing the phraseology "present emergency" to "present war," a request was presented by the chairman of the committee to change back to the word "emergency," and the statement was made that the Judge Advocate General had requested that change to be made, and some of us opposed the change back, and the Senate stood by the opposition. I think I am right about that.

Mr. HARDWICK. I think the Senator is right about it. I think the Senator from Oregon will agree to the accuracy of that statement.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President——

Mr. HARDWICK. I yield to the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The Navy bill which the Senate passed on the 15th made it very plain that the desire of the Senate was that these enlistments should be for the period of the present war, and in a half dozen amendments the Senate so asserted itself. Of course that bill is in conference, and if it is to come back here under instructions from some bureau officer we may just as well meet it now as meet it then. Some of us believe that the language "the period of the war" has a fixed and definite limitation about it.

Mr. HARDWICK. And is very much stronger than this vague word "emergency."

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The word "emergency" is elastic and can be extended to a great many situations which are really not contemplated by the bill.

Mr. WARREN. Will the Senator permit me?

Mr. HARDWICK. I yield to the Senator from Wyoming.

Mr. WARREN. Perhaps I spoke loosely when I said matters were allowed to go to conference. The Senator will remember that not only in this bill but in all others over which there is a long struggle when we come near to closing the debate on the bill it is quite a common observation, "Oh, let it go to conference,' as the Senator said, "and settle it there." For instance, there was the matter of the increase of pay for enlisted men. The Senator who offered the first amendment when his attention was called to the imperfections of the first proposal, said, "Fix it so that it may go to conference and settle the whole matter there." He was not certain that it was right, let it go, and said we will send it to conference. It went to conference. It has been a matter of considerable struggle; it went back to the House, was from there returned to the Senate, and it was finally settled, and I think very well settled. In the matter of war or emergency it has been my opinion, and it still is, that there is not the broad difference the Senator and others seem to apprehend. When it was on trial here it was not my intention to object to it, but I was willing that it should go either way, as far as that is concerned. That is what I intended to say to the Senator. But the Senator must remember that very many differences existed in this bill, as with many others, and in this case it was more difficult, because the Senate passed one separate bill and the House another, and when we had two separate bills before us we naturally had much to do to reconcile the differences between the two measures.

Mr. HARDWICK. Did the Senator have a real struggle with the House conferees on this matter?

Mr. WARREN. As I said before, the Senator's idea and mine of a struggle may differ.

Mr. HARDWICK. I am inclined to agree with the Senator about that.

Mr. WARREN. We insisted on our amendments.

Mr. HARDWICK. Do you mean that the House conferees absolutely would not agree to this amendment?

Mr. WARREN. When I say the House would not absolutely agree to it I do not know what the House finally would have done.

Mr. HARDWICK. I think I know.

Mr. WARREN. I know the House conferees stood unanimously for it.

Mr. HARDWICK. On the amendment to change the word "emergency" to "war"?

Mr. WARREN. They refused to accept our insistence.

Mr. HARDWICK. Going back for a moment and passing from that subject, I know, of course, that differences come to conference that can not always be easily adjusted in conference; but nothing ought to go to any conference from this body that is not going to be earnestly and genuinely urged by the Senate conferees. The contrary practice is what I refer to and condemn.

Mr. WARREN. I assume the Senator does not mean to impute the idea that the conferees have been recreant to their trust?

Mr. HARDWICK. Oh, the Senator knows I do not believe that.

Mr. WARREN. Let me say that I tried to retain all the terms of the Senate bill, and I protested against changes to the last. That may not be a fight, it may not be a struggle, in the estimation of the Senator, yet I think it was; and if he had been a member of the conference, he would have been perfectly satisfied that the Senate conferees were as true to this one provision as to many others, and as true to the position as he was.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President——

Mr. HARDWICK. I yield to the Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. FALL. I should like to ask the Senator who has just taken his seat if, at the meeting of the conferees, it was not practically agreed that nothing should be considered except practically a recommittal of the bill by the House to the conference on the proposition known as the Roosevelt amendment?

Mr. WARREN. The Senator asks a question of me?

Mr. FALL. Yes, sir. I am sorry I interrupted the Senator.

Mr. WARREN. I was engaged for the moment.

Mr. FALL. I asked if it was not the fact that the conferees agreed, immediately upon meeting after the action of the House and the House recommitted the bill, that they would not consider anything except the Roosevelt amendment?

Mr. WARREN. We did after there had been another meeting, and the question was whether the bill should be reported back in that form.

Mr. FALL. I should like to ask the Senator if the Senate conferees insisted upon the amendment known as the board-of-control amendment?

Mr. WARREN. They did.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, there are no very wide differences between myself and the Senator from Wyoming on matters of procedure. It is nothing personal; but there are a good many differences of a substantial nature between us with respect to this matter. The Senate did adopt this amendment after a full understanding of its import. The Senate did adopt this amendment after the gentlemen who finally represented us in the conference agreed that it ought to be made. I am merely giving my own judgment, but I am content to submit, from the statement of the Senator from Wyoming, that no real fight has been made for this amendment at all. I think, in view of its importance—its overwhelming importance—if we are to draft our blood and bone and send them to a foreign soil 3,000 miles away from this country, to fight the battles of the Republic, we ought at least not to put that burden upon them except for war, and for this German war at that.

No language that may be construed in the Judge Advocate General's Office, or somewhere else, to mean something different from that ought to mark the limit of their suffering, the limit of their service, or the measure of their obligation. We ought to put it down plainly and specifically, so that he who runs may read.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. If the Senator will allow me to make a suggestion to him it was an emergency that took our fleet to Vera Cruz——

Mr. HARDWICK. Exactly.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Not a declaration of war. It was an emergency that landed our marines in San Domingo and not a declaration of war.

Mr. HARDWICK. Exactly.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. It is an emergency that has taken our soldiers to the Mexican border, but there has been no declaration of war against Mexico. But it is a declaration of war which is responsible for this service.

Mr. HARDWICK. I thank the Senator from Michigan for his illuminating contribution, and it is illuminating right here. After this German war is over we might get into some row with some republic in Central America, and then the contention might be made that an emergency was still existing. I do not say that it would be so construed. I hope it would not be, but for one I do not want to make it possible for anybody to take our flesh and blood and draft them to involuntary military service of indefinite duration.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President——

Mr. HARDWICK. I yield to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. KELLOGG. Can this country get into war with any Republic without the consent of Congress?

Mr. HARDWICK. I do not know. I am afraid that it has done so in the past.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Yes; the Mexican War was without the consent of Congress.

Mr. KELLOGG. I asked the Senator if Congress has not full power to protect the Army against any such attempted use.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. But it has not done so.

Mr. HARDWICK. But if it refuses to do so, if it refuses now to declare definitely and precisely exactly what it means, and elects to use words capable of construction that have no definite, precise, and fixed meaning, then I would fear whether it would ever do so or not.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. If I may again interrupt the Senator, our soldiers were put into actual battle in Nicaragua within the last two years without any authority of this Government or any declaration of war by Congress. This is a dangerous precedent.

Mr. HARDWICK. That was an "emergency" and not a war.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. And the Battle of Coyetepe, in Nicaragua, is full of interest and challenges our attention; yet it has never received any consideration at the hands of Congress at all, although we lost many marines in that battle. In my opinion, there should be some formality about conduct of this character, which the people intrusted solely to their Representatives in Congress.

Mr. FLETCHER. May I interrupt the Senator from Georgia to make a suggestion?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. HARDWICK. Yes; I yield to the Senator.

Mr. FLETCHER. There is not only the use of the word "emergency," but the further use of the qualifying word "existing"—"existing emergency"; it is for the "existing emergency" that this army is raised.

Mr. HARDWICK. Well, what is the "existing emergency"?

Mr. FLETCHER. It is for the "existing emergency," not for "some emergency" that may arise in the future.

Mr. HARDWICK. What is the "existing emergency," the war with Germany?

Mr. FLETCHER. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I do not find the words "existing emergency" in section 7 of this proposed act.

Mr. HARDWICK. If you ask the military staff, they might tell you that the words "existing emergency" are necessary, so as to keep this country in a state of constant military preparation.

Mr. FLETCHER. I do not think they would make that contention for a minute. But if there is any doubt about that, I call the attention of the Senator from Georgia to the language at the bottom of page 8, where it reads:

For the period of the existing emergency.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

Mr. HARDWICK. I yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. REED. If the words "existing emergency" mean the existing war——

Mr. HARDWICK. Why not say so?

Mr. REED. Then why did the Judge Advocate General insist on changing the language in the bill? If you are going to make no change in the meaning of a law, why insist on changing the language of the law as against the expressed will of one branch of Congress?

Mr. HARDWICK. Precisely.

Mr. REED. There is an intention to give this act a different construction under the language "existing emergency" than would be given to it under the language "existing war." There is not any use of anybody trying to hide that fact.

Mr. HARDWICK. Precisely, Mr. President; and coupled with that, we not only find that where the word "war" was adopted by the Senate the conferees came back with the word "emergency," or the words "existing emergency" substituted; and not only that, but we sent to the conference section 8a of this bill, which was read just now by the Senator from Tennessee—

SEC. 8a. That the service of all persons selected by draft under the provisions of this act shall be for the period of the war, unless sooner terminated by discharge or otherwise. Whenever said war shall cease by the conclusion of peace between the United States and its enemies in the present war, the President shall so declare by a public proclamation to that effect, and from and after the date of said proclamation the provisions of this act, in so far as they authorize compulsory service by selective draft or otherwise, shall cease to be in force and effect.

When we remember that we sent that to conference, besides changing the words "existing emergency" wherever they occurred in the bill to "war," and that the conferees not only changed it back from "war" to "existing emergency" but that they struck out section 8a of the bill, I say this matter is of the utmost importance to the Congress and to the country.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE and Mr. FALL addressed the Chair.

Mr. HARDWICK. I yield first to the Senator from Wisconsin, because he first rose.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I think it is particularly significant—and I call the attention of the Senator from Georgia to the fact, if it has escaped his attention—that the word "existing," while it appears preceding the word "emergency" in some of these paragraphs, is omitted on page 10, section 4, of the bill which I have in my hand. In the provisions of this bill which relate to draft the word "existing" is, for some strange reason, omitted.

Mr. HARDWICK. Yes, sir; I knew that; but I thank the Senator from Wisconsin for pointing it out.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. If the Senator will permit me, I will say that we do not get very far fishing in muddy water, but we do not have to search with a microscope to discover the true significance of this change. The military power in this country has been anxious to establish the draft system as a permanent institution.

Mr. HARDWICK. As the permanent policy of this country.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Yes; as the permanent policy of the Government.

Mr. HARDWICK. That is what they mean, in my judgment, by this language, and that is why I am objecting to it.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. That is what the Senator from Georgia is uncovering here.

I beg the Senator's pardon; but, if he will permit me, I desire to say one word more; that is, that it is strikingly significant that both the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN] and the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN] say now on the floor here that they attach no particular difference to the meaning of the word "emergency" and the word "war." If that be so, that is pretty nearly a confession that they did not make a real fight for it in conference. If they now attach no difference of meaning to the use of those terms as applied here, then they were not in a position to make a real, earnest fight for the amendments adopted by the Senate in the exercise of its deliberate judgment and with the real conviction that in adopting those amendments in eight or nine places in the bill it was doing something of importance and of significance.

I thank the Senator from Georgia for yielding to me.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, on the 28th day of April, when this bill was before the Senate, the RECORD shows that this occurred:

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Oregon has not expired.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I yield the floor. The Senator from Georgia will call attention to the part of the bill where the word "emergency" occurs, because he has them marked.

Mr. HARDWICK. I have them marked in the bill. There are nine places where the word "emergency" occurs. It is applied to all provisions of the bill—for the men we draft, for the Regular Army, for the militia, and for this extra force. I will submit my proposition, and I think we can secure it by unanimous consent, probably, if the Senator from Oregon agrees. The Senator says that the word "emergency" means war. I hope he is right. There ought not to be room for the slightest doubt or dispute on that question. I therefore ask the Senator to consent to substitute the word "war" for the word "emergency" wherever it occurs in the bill. That should cure the trouble and serve the purpose.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. So far as I am concerned, I am willing to consent to it. I talked with the Senator from Georgia about it and expressed a willingness to assent to that change if the Senate was willing to have it made. That is what is intended by the bill, that it should be during the period of the war. I ask that the bill be amended in that respect—

And so on.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Georgia a question?

Mr. HARDWICK. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. MYERS. I have had some experience on conference committees, and I have some feeling in regard thereto. I have been excoriated most fearfully in this Chamber on account of receding as one of the conferees on the part of the Senate from Senate amendments; I have been castigated severely in regard thereto, and have been ordered to go back and stand by Senate amendments. What I wish now to ask is, if the conferees of each branch of Congress merely stand unyieldingly by the precise form of a bill, as it passed in their particular branch, and never give in on anything—never give or take—how could any bill ever be gotten through conference?

Mr. HARDWICK. The Senator is right; but, if the Senator will pardon me, I want to get through. The Senator can discuss the matter in his own time.

Mr. MYERS. I have not finished my question.

Mr. HARDWICK. All right.

Mr. MYERS. If the Senate conferees have gone on and done the best they could——

Mr. HARDWICK. That is not a question; that is a statement.

Mr. MYERS. And the conferees on the part of the other House would not recede, what else could the Senate conferees do?

Mr. HARDWICK. That statement, or the latter part of it, I believe to be an incorrect statement. I do not say that as any sort of reflection, personally or otherwise, on the conferees; but it is perfectly apparent to my mind that if the conferees think that a thing is not worth fighting for they are not apt to make a fight for it, and I do not think they did make such a fight.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President——

Mr. HARDWICK. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. FALL. I want to ask what the Senate conferees took? The Senator from Montana has suggested that conference reports are mutual agreements and that in arriving at them there must be give and take. If the Senator can point to me anything in this bill which the Senate conferees took, except at the command of the House of Representatives, I should like to have it pointed out.

Mr. HARDWICK. Certainly, there must be give and take; but the trouble is that we gave in this case when it was not at all necessary to do so.

Mr. MYERS. The Senator thinks, then, that the Senate conferees did not do their duty and did not make any fight? I ask that simply as a question.

Mr. HARDWICK. The Senator ought not to put any such question as that to a man who has had three days' experience in legislative procedure. I am discussing questions, not men. I do not think this amendment has been fought out as it ought to have been. If the Senator wants me to say that, I will say it; and I will make this further statement, that if this question had been submitted to the House of Representatives at any stage of its proceedings for a vote in that body, whether they would eliminate the word "emergency" and substitute the word "war," and it could not have gotten through the House, then I would say there was some force in the Senator's observation; but that is not true. We fought the question out in the Senate, but it was not even alluded to in the other House, and no issue was joined there upon it.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, has the Senator the slightest idea that any 10 leaders in the House could have kept in the words "existing emergency" instead of the words "existing war" if the issue had meen made?

Mr. HARDWICK. Not all the leaders in that body combined could have done it, in my judgment. Anyhow, we fought it out here; we thrashed it out here; we discussed it here; we understood it here; and after we got it fixed according to what we thought was right here, to "make assurance double sure," we took section 8a, framed by the Senator from Missouri, and put that in to double rivet it.

Mr. MYERS. The Senator, by intimating that there is no sense in my observation, is putting me in the same class with the Senate conferees. I have the consolation of knowing that I am in very good company, at any rate.

Mr. HARDWICK. Yes; the Senator is in very good company, indeed; but I refer to the Senator's proposition and not to the Senator himself. I, of course, did not mean to be personally disagreeable to the Senator. I merely referred to the proposition and asserted his statement is inapplicable; it does not apply to this case; it does not fit the facts in the case. The House of Representatives did not refuse to yield to us in this matter, and in my judgment it never would have refused to yield to us on it. We have surrendered without a battle; we have struck our flag before a shot was fired; we have surrendered in a matter that I think is of the greatest importance to the country, and as to which there was not the slightest necessity for surrendering.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I wish to contribute only a little to this discussion. I am in entire accord with what the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] has stated, but before I occupy the few moments I have in mind to speak I wish to submit a parliamentary inquiry.

We seem now to be debating the clauses of the conference report as they are read. I think the usual and better custom is to complete the reading of the conference report and then take it up for discussion. What I wish to know is, whether, if any particular provision of the conference report is considered now, will that in any wise interfere with the right of a Senator to move an amendment to the provision so considered?

The VICE PRESIDENT. A conference report can not be amended.

Mr. STONE. I may desire to be heard on that question. I am speaking now about the right to move an amendment, or to make any motion, not what the Chair may say about it when it is moved.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator can do anything, so far as that is concerned.

Mr. STONE. The Senator can not do anything. That statement is too broad, with all due respect.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Almost anything.

Mr. STONE. But the Senator can attempt to do what he thinks he has a right to do.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is what the Chair means.

Mr. STONE. Then, I repeat, does the mere debate of a provision in this conference report at this time preclude the right of a Senator later to take up that provision or the whole report for any purpose he wishes?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It does not.

Mr. STONE. That is what I wish to know.

Now, Mr. President, just a word or two by way of supplement to what both the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] and the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR] have said. I am quite familiar with the parliamentary history of this particular matter. There was here in the Senate at the time this bill was under consideration a well-defined difference of opinion among Senators with respect to what is known as the draft system and the volunteer system. There were Senators who opposed any kind of draft system. Other Senators were opposed to the particular form of the draft system as it appeared in the bill. There were others who favored the volunteer system and insisted upon testing out that plan. All these questions were discussed at length at that time. There were well-defined lines of difference. I myself drafted and offered what is known, and what appears in the bill, as section 8a. I offered that to compose the differences at issue. When I submitted that amendment the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] rose and suggested that the matter I sought to reach and the difficulty I sought to cure might be accomplished by striking out the word "emergency" where it appeared in the bill, as it did occur several times, and inserting the word "war." The Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN], in charge of the bill, indicated that he thought there was no difference between the word "emergency" and the word "war," as used or to be used, and when the suggestion of the Senator from Georgia was about to be agreed to as a solution of the issue the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] asked me if that meant that section 8a, which I had offered, would be withdrawn. I said "No"; that I desired to have that amendment voted upon.

The amendment proposed by the Senator from Georgia striking out the word "emergency," wherever it occurred, and inserting the word "war" was accepted by the Senator from Oregon, as I understood it. Then the amendment which I had offered, which is section 8a, came before the Senate, and numerous Senators said that to put the matter beyond all doubt, beyond all question, even after the word "emergency" was eliminated and the word "war" inserted, section 8a should be agreed to, so that there would be no doubt about conscription ending when peace was reached and declared, as provided for by section 8a at the close of the war with Germany. So section 8a was agreed to unanimously in the Senate.

That is a correct parliamentary record of what occurred, and I join with the Senator from Tennessee and the Senator from Georgia in expressing my astonishment that all these amendments were left out by the conference committee. I can not escape the impression, which they have, that there must have been a motive and influence of some kind from somewhere to bring that about. I absolve our conferees of anything to their discredit, but somewhere and somehow some influence must have operated. It has been stated here, and I think truly stated, that the Army people stand for a permanent conscription policy. They wanted what they have got in this conference report; at least I fear so.

Mr. President, I am opposed to a permanent compulsory-service policy. I so stated in the speech I made in support of the conscription plan proposed in the bill reported by the Military Committee. I supported conscription, as I stated, only as a war measure, and also stated that I would not support such a policy in or for a time of peace, and for that reason I wished it to be made clear beyond peradventure that the conscription plan was to terminate at the end of this war, and the Senate agreed to that view by adopting amendments proposed by the Senator from Georgia and the amendment (section 8a) which I proposed. Now, all these amendments, the one I proposed and those the Senator from Georgia proposed, are all out of this conference bill, and we are left to wander in the realm of conjecture as to where we are and where we get off.

I think it would be wiser to have this bill go back to conference.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I direct the attention of the Vice President and Senators to section 5 of the conference report, page 13, line 23, which reads as follows:

Upon conviction in the district court of the United States——

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is not on page 13 in the Chair's print of the bill.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I have here a print of the bill as agreed to in conference. That is the way it is entitled.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator should have a copy of the bill as agreed to in the third conference.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. It will be necessary for me to find the provision, then, if I may be indulged for just a moment. I think no change has been made by the third conference in the provision to which I wish to call the attention of the Vice President and of the Senate; and I am not able just at the moment, to turn to it in the new print which has been handed to me.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Perhaps the chairman of the committee will know, if the Senator will read the clause in the old print.

Mr. OVERMAN. The clerk of the committee can give it to the Senator.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Section 5, on page 13 of the print that I have, contains a change made by the conferees, I think in violation of the rules.

As the bill passed the Senate, on page 24, section 4, line 10, it contained this provision:

Be punished by imprisonment for not less than three months nor more than one year.

As the bill passed the House and came to the Senate it contained exactly the same words, as shown on page 10, lines 8 and 9:

Be punished by imprisonment for not less than three months nor more than one year.

As changed by the conferees, the words "less than three months nor" have been dropped out, so that the provision reads:

Shall * * * be punished by imprisonment for not more than one year.

In other words, the conferees, having before them a House provision and a Senate provision with respect to this matter that were identical in terms, have assumed the right to change the legislation with regard to the penalty imposed for non-registering, and to clothe the court with power to impose a different penalty than that which both the House and the Senate have fixed by legislative action. In the third print it is found on page 14, Mr. President. Now, I make the point of order against it.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, while the conferees may have violated the rule, I should like to ask the Senator if he does not think the change is an improvement?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I do not think that makes any difference, Mr. President. I think the danger of permitting conferees to assume the functions of either or both branches of Congress is too grave a danger to be passed over any longer. There are some glaring instances of great wrong having been done as a result of the Senate sanctioning that practice.

Mr. LODGE and Mr. SMITH of Georgia addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I do.

Mr. LODGE. There is a rule in the House which makes new legislation placed in conference reports by conferees out of order. For long years I have wished that we had that rule in the Senate, but I have never found it here and have never been able to get it. It is a wise rule.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. And yet, Mr. President, I can cite a precedent for the making of a point of order in a case exactly four-square with this, where the Vice President submitted the point of order to the Senate.

Mr. LODGE. I can find a great many where the Senate had deliberately accepted new legislation in conference reports.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, if it is a good precedent, I think it ought to be followed, rather than the bad precedent cited by the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Shall the Chair rule on the point of order?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I was going to make just one suggestion in reference to that. The bill was amended by the Senate striking out all after the enacting clause of the House bill and substituting a new bill. The House has disagreed to the amendment of the Senate to the House bill, and I think we have a right to consider any change in that amendment and the language of the House bill that we desire to. The Senator from Wisconsin admits that the change is a beneficial one.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. No; I do not so admit at all. I did not answer that question. I say that the practice is reprehensible, whatever the effect of the change of the language may be.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Possibly that is true in regard to the change of language generally; but I claim that we had an absolute right to do that in this case, because it was simply one amendment.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I think that is an added reason why——

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. As a matter of fact, the members of the conference committee thought that the penalty imposed as the bill passed both bodies was rather severe; and the purpose of it was, really, to modify a punishment which in some cases might be very severe for a given offense.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, as to the point of order, that has been ruled on repeatedly. Of course, a motion to send a bill back to conference is in order; but to make a point of order is, under our rules or practices, I think without precedent.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair has a pretty clear recollection of the proceedings of the last four years. The Chair believes—not speaking as to this particular question—that conferees have no authority whatever, where there is no matter in dispute between the House and the Senate, to deliberately legislate upon the question, or to insert new matter in a bill. The precedents of the Senate have been, except in one instance, uniformly to the contrary, it having been the precedent of the Senate that the way to reach those questions was to refuse to agree to the conference report and send the bill back to conference. Upon one occasion the present occupant of the chair, however, felt that the point of order should not be decided by the Chair but should be left to the Senate. It was left to the Senate, and the point of order was sustained by the Senate. Upon another occasion the present occupant of the chair said, when the question arose, that he was going to decide the point of order and reverse the rulings of the Senate. Like everybody else, however, he reserved the right to change his opinion.

This military bill is entirely too important a matter for the Chair to make a test case out of it. The Chair submits this point of order to the Senate for its determination. The question is as to whether the point of order is well taken.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, may I ask that the point of order be restated for the information of the Senate?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The point of order is this: In the original bill, as passed by the House, the minimum penalty for failing to register was three months' punishment and the maximum penalty was one year. The Senate amendment also adopted that. When it came into conference the conferees changed it by providing that failure to register should be punished by imprisonment for not more than one year, being a part, however, of an amendment.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, it is not a new thing in the Senate to hear the conference committees criticized.

The VICE PRESIDENT. May the Chair make just one further statement before the Senator from Oregon proceeds?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Yes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is not speaking as to this particular matter, because the Chair is not advised as to this matter. It was only on general principles that the Chair spoke.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. So, I say, I do not mind the criticism of the conference committee, Mr. President; but there has been some suggestion here of improper motives or improper influence in some quarters that induced changes in the bill as it passed the Senate. I do not know whether that is directed toward the committee or toward the War Department. I want to say that, so far as the members of the conference committee are concerned, the suggestion of an improper motive is wholly unjustified; and I want to say in reference to the War Department that in all of the discussions that have taken place between the members of the conference committee and the members of the Military Affairs Committee and officers of the Army and the Secretary of War there has never been a suggestion at any time that this measure was intended other than as a temporary measure.

Now the suggestion is made here by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE], I believe, and possibly by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE], that leaving out the word "existing" occasionally where "emergency" is used in the bill shows an intent to fasten a permanent policy of the draft on the country. Mr. President, I believe I have a reasonable amount of intelligence; I do not lay claim to any brilliancy of intellect; but if the War Department had any ulterior purpose to fasten a permanent system on the country they have completely deceived the conferees. There has not been a suggestion at any time that this was intended to establish a permanent system.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I do.

Mr. GALLINGER. Can the chairman of the committee enlighten me by giving the reason for leaving out the word "existing"? What is the purpose of it?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. We had no purpose except to leave the word out where it was unnecessary. The fact is, the question was never raised until right now.

Mr. GALLINGER. But it was in the bill.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. It may have been; but there was no purpose in leaving it out, if it has been left out, Mr. President.

I want to say that the conferees of the Senate possibly have not stood for some of these things as long as they ought to have stood for them. I say to the Senate frankly that if this had been any ordinary measure, in any ordinary time, when the House conferees came over here with instructions from the House to put certain things in the bill, I would have remained firm to keep them out. But we are in war. Here we are splitting hairs on propositions in this bill now, with danger at our very doors, and the Senate threatening to send this bill back to conference.

Now, the bill is not perfect. It does not suit me. It does not suit the conferees. But we had a very delicate task to perform. There were members of the conference committee—and I say it with entire respect—who were opposed to the theory of the whole bill. They, as far as they could, were trying to obey the demands of their respective Houses. We tried to do what the Senate wanted. I serve notice on the Senate right now, and I do it coolly and deliberately, that if this bill goes back to conference there will be no military legislation here under 30 or 60 or 90 days.

Mr. STONE. Why?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Why? Because of the differences that exist between the two bodies now, with the House sending the bill back with an immaterial amendment, with a great war threatening the United States, on a question of two or three or four dollars' increase of pay per month for the enlisted man; and, instead of consuming a cherry at one bite, they sent the bill back on two different occasions, and the indications were that it might come back into conference again.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GALLINGER in the chair). Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Yes.

Mr. FALL. On the first occasion they sent it back with instructions to agree with the Senate, did they not? That was not an attempt to delay things, was it?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. No; probably not, Mr. President. Both parties played politics on that, I think. Why, Mr. President, the Members of the House had voted on the so-called Roosevelt proposition once and had turned it down, and they reversed themselves and put it in and instructed their conferees to agree to the Senate amendment.

But, Mr. President, I am just trying to tell in my humble way the difficulties that confronted this committee. If this bill goes back—and it is up to the Senate to say whether it wants to send it back or not—I do not know whether we will be able to agree on any legislation or not.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Yes, sir.

Mr. HARDWICK. Why is it, Mr. President, that the conferees found it necessary to substitute the word "emergency" instead of "war"?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I have been over that. I am not going to waste any more time talking about that, with all due respect to the Senator. We have been over that.

Mr. HARDWICK. Well, I wanted the information.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I have told the Senator.

Mr. HARDWICK. I did not hear it, then.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I have said before, I said when this bill was in the Senate once before, and I have said to-day, that it does not make any difference, according to my way of thinking, whether the word "war" or "emergency" is used in the bill. I may be dull; but I did not see any difference when we agreed to the amendment in the Senate to substitute "war" for "emergency," the first time, and I do not see any difference in it now; but we did insist on retaining it in conference. We did not make as hard a fight as we would have made for all the Senate amendments if it had been an ordinary bill in ordinary times.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oregon will suspend. The hour of 1 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 2263) to provide further for the national security and defense, to conserve food, feeds, and fuels, and to prevent monopolies, conspiracies, and other evil practices respecting the same, and for other purposes.

Mr. GORE. I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oklahoma asks unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. The Senator from Oregon will proceed.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, there are some distinguished Senators here who are entirely opposed to the principle involved in this bill—that is, compulsory service. Those gentlemen made a gallant fight against the bill when it was in the Senate and they were defeated on that proposition. Now they ought to be willing to accept that feature of the bill after it carried in both the Senate and House and after the conferees of both bodies have agreed to it. Yet the same gentlemen are now making the most strenuous fight against the bill and are undertaking to have it referred to the conference.

I want the Senate to understand how deeply I feel about it, because I know the difficulty the conferees have had ever since they went into the consideration of the bill. We had a hard time to reach an agreement, and I do hope the Senate will decide against the point of order made by the Senator from Wisconsin, because if that point of order is sustained the whole bill goes back to conference.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I sympathize with the desire to move rapidly in all legislation, provided that rapid movement is intelligent and thoughtful. We all realize that a declaration of war has been made, and we are taking steps to organize an army. We all who know anything about it know that it is absolutely essential that officers be provided to take charge of the troops and that men are now being called into camp, beginning last Monday, to be trained for officers. It will be certainly 90 days before they will be ready to assume responsibility as officers.

The active work we are to do now is to be largely on the other side of the Atlantic with our vessels. We began in 1915 to furnish the Navy Department and the administration all the money they needed to prepare the Navy for the contingency that threatened us, and I trust that branch of our military force is reasonably well prepared for immediate service. I do not sympathize with the desire to hasten an unprepared army across the water.

Now, coming to the immediate question in this bill, I do not understand why anyone wishes to use the term "emergency" instead of "this war." I voted for the draft provision; I was willing to vote for it to prepare at once for the war with Germany; but I am opposed to it for any other purpose that I know. I am utterly opposed to it as a permanent part of our military system.

What do we want the word "emergency" for instead of the words "war with Germany"? I do not exactly know, and I do not like the fact that somebody does want it. I do not think the House prefers the word "emergency." I do not believe if the issue was made in the House of Representatives on the words "war with Germany" and the word "emergency" you could hold the House against voting for the term "the war with Germany." I do not believe 15 per cent of the Members of the House would consent to a permanent draft system or vote for it except in view of the war with Germany, the greatest military power in the world, and in recognition of the fact that being at war with the greatest of all military powers we must be prepared to mobilize all the strength of our Nation, if necessary, to meet the responsibilities of this war. It is the war with Germany that brought the vote for the draft system, and nothing else.

I do not see why the language could not stay in the bill that the Senate inserted. The chairman of the committee tells us, as I understood him, that in rewriting the bill he did not observe until the report reached the Senate that the language had been changed.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. No.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I understood him to make that statement.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. No; I consented to have the word "war" substituted for "emergency" in the Senate.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I knew that.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. It went into conference, and when reported back the word "emergency" was in it. I knew the word was in it.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It was the word "existing" then to which the chairman referred. It was a little difficult to catch what the Senator did say. I misunderstood him. He did not know the word "existing" had been left out.

I do not desire to delay this bill but I do desire very much to have an express declaration that this draft system deals with the war with Germany, and that this draft will not continue for some other emergency after the war with Germany is over. If we could present a special bill and put it through cotemporaneously that might accomplish it. Unless something can be done to make that absolutely certain, I do not think we should agree to the conference report.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Does the Senator regard it as necessary to put through a bill cotemporaneously with this one in order to make that matter clear? Can it not be done at any time in the judgment of Congress?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It should be done at once, if that is what we mean. We can put through a bill declaratory of the meaning of this draft system now. If there is any doubt about the willingness of the Senate to pass such a measure and to say it is limited to the war with Germany, I am unalterably opposed to the passage of this bill or agreeing myself to the conference report.

Mr. THOMAS. Does not the Senator know that an attempt to pass an independent bill regarding that subject would lead to debate?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do not think so. I think the Senate is overwhelmingly in favor of limiting the draft system to the war with Germany.

Mr. HARDWICK. If my colleague will yield, the place to do it is here and now, not later.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. If the Senator will permit me, the Senate did say, in section 8a as it passed the bill in very specific terms, that the service of all persons selected by draft under the provisions of this act shall be for the period of the war, and so forth. But that is dropped out in this conference report.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. If this bill means anything else we ought not to pass it; we ought to stop it. There is not any excuse for this conference report to go through except upon the theory that the existing emergency limits the legislation to this war, and the insistence with which the word "emergency" is adhered to makes me feel we ought not to adopt it without qualifications, that it is dangerous.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. May I suggest to the Senator, the House had this bill under discussion for several days, and nobody made any question about it. They accepted it as being only a temporary measure. That is the understanding of the House conferees; that is the understanding of everybody; that is the assertion of men connected with the War Department. It is only effective during this struggle.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Then what would be the objection to using words limiting it to the war with Germany?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I say to the Senator again, so far as I am individually concerned, I do not see any difference. I have not been able to draw a distinction between "during the war" and "emergency."

Let me say to the Senator, if this bill goes back I want the Senator to understand the difficulty we have had, and we are not going to get together again on this bill. We have just exhausted the very last resources we had to get the bill out of conference at all. If it goes back and the bill is opened up, let me say there are 15 or 20 points of serious difference between us, and if it ever gets opened up it will be opened for all time, and we can never agree on it. I want the Senator to know who will be responsible for that.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It was in the hope that I might possibly avoid embarrassing the committee and the legislation that I threw out the suggestion of immediate action on a joint resolution declaring that the term "emergency" as used in the bill must be construed to be the war with Germany.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. What would be the status of the conference report if the point of order is sustained?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will go back to the committee.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. It defeats the report?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It recommits it.

Mr. STONE. Recommits it to what?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. To the committee of conference.

Mr. STONE. If the Senator from Georgia will allow me, under the precedents, as I understand them, where the House has acted as it has in this instance and its conferees have been discharged, even a motion to recommit is not in order.

Mr. LODGE. If the Senator will allow me, to recommit it is impossible at this stage, because the conferees of the House have acted; their report has been accepted. I took occasion to look up the question of recommittal with some care the other day in view of the action of the House. All the authorities are uniform. It can not be recommitted if either set of conferees are out of office, and their being out of office is determined by the House having acted. The House have acted and their conferees have ceased to exist.

Mr. STONE. That is the only question, whether the mere acceptance of the report by the House operates in itself to discharge the conferees.

Mr. LODGE. That has been held by all Speakers of the House and I think is uncontested.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The present occupant of the chair had overlooked the fact that the report had been acted on by the other House. In view of that fact, if the point of order prevails or if the conference report is rejected, another conference will become necessary.

Mr. LODGE. I think the Chair will find on examining the precedents the proper and necessary motion is to insist and ask for another conference.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Undoubtedly that is correct. That motion will be in order.

Mr. LODGE. It simply bars the motion of recommittal, because there is no longer a conference to recommit it to.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Undoubtedly, if the House conferees are discharged, the bill can not be sent back to our conferees, but we could adhere to our former action and ask for a further conference.

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In answer to the interrogatory of the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] as to what would be the status of the conference report in case the point of order which was made by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] should prevail, the Chair inadvertently overlooked the fact in making his reply, as already stated, that the conference report had been acted upon by the House of Representatives, and suggested that the report would go back to conference. The Chair should have stated that if the conference report is rejected and a motion for a new conference should prevail, and the House should agree to it, the bill then would go back to conference.

Mr. LODGE. And, of course, if I may be pardoned a word, the motion to concur, if it be agreed to, will end the matter; but if it fails, then a new conference is asked for.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is undoubtedly correct.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The opportunity of further conference could unquestionably be given. If we could limit our action to that one feature and send it back, we would have a very simple mode of procedure.

Mr. President, I want to say while I am on the floor the practice of one House passing one bill and the other House passing another bill and referring two entirely different bills to conference is fraught with necessary embarrassment. We ought never to do it. The conferees write a new bill, and neither House of Congress really makes the bill.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator will recognize that having passed one bill here and the House having passed another, the only way in conference was for us to do what we did.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I am criticizing what the Senate did before we sent it to conference.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator is right, that it causes great embarrassment. The only excuse, if any is necessary as to the present legislation, is that the effort to hasten legislation caused it to be acted upon simultaneously in both Houses.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It is a procedure that delays legislation. When the House bill got here, if we had taken it up and considered the House bill paragraph by paragraph and amended it, we would have been very much closer to action which would have been satisfactory to the Senate and House.

Mr. WARREN. Yet the Senator will remember that in the espionage bill it took considerable time for the House bill to pass after it came here.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It is still in conference.

Mr. WARREN. We will now come pretty nearly building up a new bill.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It is very bad practice; it practically eliminates action by the Senate or the House and confines us largely to the work of the conferees.

Mr. President, I do not wish to embarrass the committee or the new conferees, but I can not see why we can not carry to the House of Representatives a single proposition embodying a declaration in connection with the bill that its life or the provisions for the draft are to end and the provision for this army is to end with the German war.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator will recognize, however, that the pending motion is upon entirely another matter, which does not reflect at all the point the Senator proposes to reach.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I understand that. I am anxious to avoid the limitation of our status to the present motion. I think it is probably true that the conferees exceeded their authority in striking out the three months, but if they had not done it we ought to have at once passed a bill striking the three months from it. To have left the provision that any boy who failed to register, any one of the large number of men who fail to comply with the requirements of the bill should upon conviction be confined not less than three months would have been inexcusable.

Mr. WARREN. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes.

Mr. WARREN. I agree with the Senator perfectly on that point; but beyond that is the difficulty, if it is carried to a jury, of ever getting a conviction, because even where a party is guilty, or perhaps ought to be found so, when it is considered excessive the Senator knows it is difficult to obtain conviction. I have in mind, for instance, that my first duty when I came to the Senate was imposed upon me by the request of the United States district judge in my district to enact a law which would give five years' imprisonment as a maximum with out a minimum. It covered such cases as where a soldier stole property of the United States. He would steal a pair of mittens or a cap, or something of that kind, and when the case got before the jury they nearly always found him not guilty. I secured legislation on that point, and the act is now on the statute book.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The statement of the Senator simply illustrates and emphasizes the impropriety of leaving the legislation where a minimum sentence must be three months. If this stays in the bill because the conferees could not change it, then we ought to pass at once a bill changing the statute and allowing the judge to make a day's sentence, leaving the sentence to the discretion of the judge without limitation.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes.

Mr. REED. When this bill was before the committee I called attention to this very clause and asked at the time that the minimum penalty be stricken out, and I could get no support in the committee. Undoubtedly the change in the bill made by the conferees is in the interest of justice both from the standpoint of the enforcement of the law and from the standpoint of humanity, but the matter was considered in the committee because I raised the question in the committee and it was turned down. Of course, the question we are going to vote on here ought not to be on the merits of this particular proposition, but it ought to be on the merits of the legal question, namely, whether the conferees can rewrite a bill.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The conferees had to rewrite the bill when two entirely different bills were passed.

Mr. OVERMAN. But not change the substance.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. LODGE. I rose because I thought the Senator had finished.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I am about to finish. I was about to finish three or four times when I was asked questions. I yield to the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I call the Senator's attention to the fact that this bill is one amendment. We had to agree upon that one amendment, and it was reported back to the House and it receded from its disagreement. The whole amendment is set out.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I can not agree to the view that where one amendment made by the Senate is an entire bill the conferees are free to change provisions the same in the House and Senate bills.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Will the Senator yield to me for just a moment?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I yield.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I will withdraw the point of order that I have made in order that the vote may come upon the proposition of sending the conference report back for further consideration.

I shall take the opportunity, Mr. President, if that same provision appears in the conference report when it comes back again, to make a fight upon it. I withdraw the point of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the withdrawal of the point of order? The Chair hears none. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I will not take time to discuss the point of order further than to say that there is no Senate rule upon the subject, and never has been. The Senate has decided the question of new matter in a conference report on its merits and it has decided it in different ways. I may recall one rather important occasion, the famous passport amendment. I say "famous" because it has been referred to here many times. That amendment, which settled the question of the Japanese immigration, was put into a conference report. There was not one word on the subject in the bill. It was put in and agreed to by the Senate as an emergency necessity.

The passage on which this point of order was made is an admitted improvement. I will not vote, for one, to defeat the bill on a technicality; I should not think of doing it; but we have an absolute right here in the Senate to decide on anything of that sort. In the first place, I do not believe it is good; but I do not want to go into that at length. This is the substitution of a complete bill for another. It is a recognized method of legislation. We can no more get rid of it than we can get rid of passing a bill through the regular form. It must be done. It is constantly done. But it presents to the conferees a very difficult situation when they have two complete bills out of which they must bring a third.

I have not the slightest question that it was the intention of the conferees to adhere as closely as possible to the rules of the House in regard to new legislation. This bill passed the House with the strictest kind of a rule, and nobody thought of raising this point.

Now, as to the emergency. I am not a friend of excessive powers and I have no desire to expand these powers unduly or keep them in existence beyond the war, but I can not see, myself, why there is any great difference between the words "existing emergency" and the word "war." The only emergency that exists is the war with Germany at this moment. There may be others. We may have war with Austria at any moment and it may be necessary to take steps, but when you say "existing emergency" and found your whole bill on that phrase, what possibility is there of its being carried beyond the existing emergency? The words "existing emergency" occur in the third line of the bill, the defining words, which express the purpose of the bill once and for all. There is no court on earth that would not take the words "existing emergency" in the third line as defining the purpose and the life of the bill.

But, Mr. President, I do not think it is a very important point. We use the word "war" in the naval bill. You can not maintain armies without money; and under the Constitution you can not make an appropriation for the Army that runs over two years. This great appropriation which we are making is only calculated for one year. It is all in our hands so long as we hold the purse strings. I do not think there is any danger in the way so long as we use the words "existing emergency."

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Let me ask the Senator in this connection what would be the objection in putting a clause into the Army bill, which is here before us, defining and carrying out substantially section 8a, "that the draft system shall be limited to the period of the war"?

Mr. LODGE. If there is a desire to pass a joint resolution of that sort, it can be passed through both Houses in a few moments. I do not think it is in the least necessary to do so; but my objection now to sending this bill back to conference is because I am not willing to delay or endanger the bill.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I am trying to avoid delaying it, and yet have the safeguard. I would ask the Senator from Massachusetts whether he does not think we could not get an agreement to add to the military bill, which is before us, a clause that would cover this question, namely, providing that the term "emergency" as used in this bill should be defined as relating to the present war?

Mr. LODGE. We could pass a joint resolution to that effect and send it over to the other House. I have no doubt they would agree to it; but I do not want to have this bill go back to conference.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I am not proposing to send the bill back to conference, but, after agreeing to the conference report on this bill, we shall at once have before us the military bill.

Mr. LODGE. Does the Senator mean the appropriation bill?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes.

Mr. LODGE. Certainly; put it in by all means.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. That, of course, would be subject to a point of order, but I do not think any Senator would make it.

Mr. LODGE. I do not think it would be subject to a point of order. The Chair ruled yesterday, and ruled correctly, about general legislation on that bill, that the bill, in the first place, is not a regular appropriation bill. It is crammed with general legislation.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It is not a general appropriation bill.

Mr. LODGE. No.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It is subject to legislative provisions.

Mr. LODGE. It is crammed with legislative provisions now.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. We could put a clause onto that bill similar to section 8a and save the necessity of sending the pending bill back to conference.

Mr. LODGE. I see no reason why we should not do that. Section 8a is a declaration that this legislation is for the war with Germany, is it not? I do not recall at this moment the terms, but I suppose it relates to limiting the legislation to the war with Germany. Is not that true?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It is.

Mr. FALL. Will the Senator from Massachusetts yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. LODGE. Yes.

Mr. FALL. Do I understand the Senator from Massachusetts to say—I know I understood the chairman of the committee to say—that he does not understand the difference between "war" and an "existing emergency"?

Mr. LODGE. Yes; I know they are different words.

Mr. FALL. The use of the word "emergency" in legislation such as this implies preparing for war possibly, if it is a war emergency, or closing up affairs after the war is over. War creates a status, not an emergency, and the emergency is either preparatory to or succeeding the war. That is exactly, in my judgment—I do not want to take the Senator's time—the purpose of this change of words.

Mr. LODGE. There is no emergency now existing or confronting this country to-day except the war with Germany.

Mr. FALL. Well, Mr. President, I must beg to call the Senator's attention to the fact that we have now 40,000 troops on the Mexican border; that members of the National Guard are mustered into the Federal service; and that the Judge Advocate General——

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

Mr. FALL. If the Senator will permit me—the Judge Advocate General has declared that there is an emergency, a war existing on the border.

Mr. LODGE. Very well. If there is a war on the Mexican border and an emergency there, that is an argument for using the word "emergency."

Mr. FALL. It would be, of course, for a Senator who favors the draft system, but not for a Senator who does not favor the draft system.

Mr. LODGE. If we need troops in Mexico, we had better use a broad word. My own construction of the language is that it covers the war with Germany. I do not see the slightest danger to be apprehended from using this language. But if anyone is nervous about it, it is perfectly easy to adopt the suggestion of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] and put a clause into the pending appropriation bill which will place the matter beyond any doubt.

Mr. STONE. But that will have to go through both Houses.

Mr. LODGE. Well, why not?

Mr. STONE. And would have to go to a conference committee.

Mr. LODGE. Certainly. Mr. President the point with me, and it is a very simple one, is that I want this bill to become law. It has been fully debated; it has been in three conferences. I do not want to delay it; I want it to become law at once, because we are at war. That is just the point where we divide.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I understand the Senator from Massachusetts wants this bill to go through and to leave the limitation to be put upon another bill, which must go through the same processes of legislation. We have this limitation on this bill; that is to say, the Senate put it on the bill, but it has been brought back here with the limitation stricken out of the bill. What assurance have we that we can put the limitation on another bill better or any more certainly than we can put it upon this bill?

Mr. LODGE. Well, Mr. President, the point is whether or not the Senate wants to delay this bill. That is the only point.

Mr. STONE. Oh, Mr. President that is all right; everybody wants to pass the bill, and to pass it promptly.

Mr. LODGE. Well, then, let us pass it if everybody wants to pass it.

Mr. STONE. Everybody wants to pass the bill in its main features; but we are coming up here against that question every day. We have got to look a little bit beyond our noses, Mr. President; we have got to see what the effect of legislation is going to be not for this emergency, or for this hour, but for the future as well. Senators come in here—if the Senator from Massachusetts will permit me——

Mr. LODGE. I will yield the floor entirely in a moment, I only want to finish what I was going to say.

Mr. STONE. I am through, except I should like to say this——

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. STONE. That Senators come in here and Representatives go into the other House and say "we are at war, and therefore we must not perfect legislation, but we must pass it in any form in which it comes to us." I do not like that.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I spoke yesterday strongly, and as I felt, in favor of the two Houses of Congress taking time to perfect this legislation; but the military bill has been before both Houses for a long time; it has been through three conferences; it has had the fullest and most ample consideration. It is the most essential bill that we have had before us, except the naval bill, which has gone through. It is the most important bill, because you can not fight a war without men; and this is a bill to get the men and to get the Army in order to fight the war. I repeat, it has had full discussion in both Houses, and every day is of importance to have the provisions of the bill carried into effect. My own belief is that if we again send it back to conference it will meet a very long, a very serious, and a very unfortunate delay.

Mr. BECKHAM. Mr. President, what is the status of the point of order made by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE]?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That has been withdrawn, and the question now is on agreeing to the conference report.

Mr. ASHURST obtained the floor.

Mr. STONE. The conference report has not yet been read. All this debate has come up as we have gone along. I asked the Chair some time ago why we did not go on and have the conference report read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If the Senator asks that the conference report be read, it will be read.

Mr. STONE. I ask that it be read.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

Mr. ASHURST. I will yield to any Senator who wishes to interrupt me, but I only desire four or five minutes of time.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I ask the Senator from Arizona if he will not permit the conference report to be read?

Mr. ASHURST. I will.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The reading of the conference report will be continued.

The Secretary resumed and concluded the reading of the conference report, as follows:

"The President is hereby authorized to establish additional boards, one in each Federal judicial district of the United States, consisting of such number of citizens, not connected with the Military Establishment, as the President may determine, who shall be appointed by the President. The President is hereby authorized, in his discretion, to establish more than one such board in any Federal judicial district of the United States, or to establish one such board having jurisdiction of an area extending into more than one Federal judicial district.

"Such district boards shall review on appeal and affirm, modify, or reverse any decision of any local board having jurisdiction in the area in which any such district board has jurisdiction under the rules and regulations prescribed by the President. Such district boards shall have exclusive original jurisdiction within their respective areas to hear and determine all questions or claims for including or excluding or discharging persons or classes of persons from the selective draft, under the provisions of this act, not included within the original jurisdiction of such local boards.

"The decisions of such district boards shall be final except that, in accordance with such rules and regulations as the President may prescribe, he may affirm, modify, or reverse any such decision.

"Any vacancy in any such local board or district board shall be filled by the President, and any member of any such local board or district board may be removed and another appointed in his place by the President, whenever he considers that the interest of the Nation demands it.

"The President shall make rules and regulations governing the organization and procedure of such local boards and district boards, and providing for and governing appeals from such local boards to such district boards, and reviews of the decisions of any local board by the district board having jurisdiction, and determining and prescribing the several areas in which the respective local boards and district boards shall have jurisdiction, and all other rules and regulations necessary to carry out the terms and provisions of this section, and shall provide for the issuance of certificates of exemption, or partial or limited exemptions, and for a system to exclude and discharge individuals from selective draft.

"SEC. 5. That all male persons between the ages of 21 and 30, both inclusive, shall be subject to registration in accordance with regulations to be prescribed by the President; and upon proclamation by the President or other public notice given by him or by his direction stating the time and place of such registration it shall be the duty of all persons of the designated ages, except officers and enlisted men of the Regular Army, the Navy, and the National Guard and Naval Militia while in the service of the United States, to present themselves for and submit to registration under the provisions of this act; and every such person shall be deemed to have notice of the requirements of this act upon the publication of said proclamation or other notice as aforesaid given by the President or by his direction; and any person who shall willfully fail or refuse to present himself for registration or to submit thereto as herein provided, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor and shall, upon conviction in the district court of the United States having jurisdiction thereof, be punished by imprisonment for not more than one year, and shall thereupon be duly registered: Provided, That in the call of the docket precedence shall be given, in courts trying the same, to the trial of criminal proceedings under this act: Provided further, That persons shall be subject to registration as herein provided who shall have attained their twenty-first birthday and who shall not have attained their thirty-first birthday on or before the day set for the registration, and all persons so registered shall be and remain subject to draft into the forces hereby authorized, unless exempted or excused therefrom as in this act provided: Provided further, That in the case of temporary absence from actual place of legal residence of any person liable to registration as provided herein such registration may be made by mail under regulations to be prescribed by the President.

"SEC. 6. That the President is hereby authorized to utilize the service of any or all departments and any or all officers or agents of the United States and of the several States, Territories, and the District of Columbia, and subdivisions thereof, in the execution of this act, and all officers and agents of the United States and of the several States, Territories, and subdivisions thereof, and of the District of Columbia, and all persons designated or appointed under regulations prescribed by the President whether such appointments are made by the President himself or by the governor or other officer of any State or Territory to perform any duty in the execution of this act, are hereby required to perform such duty as the President shall order or direct, and all such officers and agents and persons so designated or appointed shall hereby have full authority for all acts done by them in the execution of this act by the direction of the President. Correspondence in the execution of this act may be carried in penalty envelopes bearing the frank of the War Department. Any person charged as herein provided with the duty of carrying into effect any of the provisions of this act or the regulations made or directions given thereunder who shall fail or neglect to perform such duty; and any person charged with such duty or having and exercising any authority under said act, regulations, or directions, who shall knowingly make or be a party to the making of any false or incorrect registration, physical examination, exemption, enlistment, enrollment, or muster; and any person who shall make or be a party to the making of any false statement or certificate as to the fitness or liability of himself or any other person for service under the provisions of this act, or regulations made by the President thereunder, or otherwise evades or aids another to evade the requirements of this act or of said regulations, or who, in any manner, shall fail or neglect fully to perform any duty required of him in the execution of this act, shall, if not subject to military law, be guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction in the district court of the United States having jurisdiction thereof, be punished by imprisonment for not more than one year, or, if subject to military law, shall be tried by court-martial and suffer such punishment as a court-martial may direct.

"SEC. 7. That the qualifications and conditions for voluntary enlistment as herein provided shall be the same as those prescribed by existing law for enlistments in the Regular Army, except that recruits must be between the ages of 18 and 40 years, both inclusive, at the time of their enlistment; and such enlistments shall be for the period of the emergency unless sooner discharged. All enlistments, including those in the Regular Army Reserve, which are in force on the date of the approval of this act and which would terminate during the emergency shall continue in force during the emergency unless sooner discharged; but nothing herein contained shall be construed to shorten the period of any existing enlistment: Provided, That all persons enlisted or drafted under any of the provisions of this act shall as far as practicable be grouped into units by States and the political subdivisions of the same: Provided further, That all persons who have enlisted since April 1, 1917, either in the Regular Army or in the National Guard, and all persons who have enlisted in the National Guard since June 3, 1916, upon their application, shall be discharged upon the termination of the existing emergency.

"The President may provide for the discharge of any or all enlisted men whose status with respect to dependents renders such discharge advisable; and he may also authorize the employment on any active duty of retired enlisted men of the Regular Army, either with their rank on the retired list or in higher enlisted grades, and such retired enlisted men shall receive the full pay and allowances of the grades in which they are actively employed.

"SEC. 8. That the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, is authorized to appoint for the period of the existing emergency such general officers of appropriate grades as may be necessary for duty with brigades, divisions, and higher units in which the forces provided for herein may be organized by the President, and general officers of appropriate grade for the several Coast Artillery districts. In so far as such appointments may be made from any of the forces herein provided for, the appointees may be selected irrespective of the grades held by them in such forces. Vacancies in all grades in the Regular Army resulting from the appointment of officers thereof to higher grades in the forces other than the Regular Army herein provided for shall be filled by temporary promotions and appointments in the manner prescribed for filling temporary vacancies by section 114 of the national defense act approved June 3, 1916; and officers appointed under the provisions of this act to higher grades in the forces other than the Regular Army herein provided for shall not vacate their permanent commissions nor be prejudiced in their relative or lineal standing in the Regular Army.

"SEC. 9. That the appointments authorized and made as provided by the second, third, fourth, fifth, sixth, and seventh paragraphs of section 1 and by section 8 of this act, and the temporary appointments in the Regular Army authorized by the first paragraph of section 1 of this act, shall be for the period of the emergency, unless sooner terminated by discharge or otherwise. The President is hereby authorized to discharge any officer from the office held by him under such appointment for any cause which, in the judgment of the President, would promote the public service; and the general commanding any division and higher tactical organization or territorial department is authorized to appoint from time to time military boards of not less than three nor more than five officers of the forces herein provided for to examine into and report upon the capacity, qualification, conduct, and efficiency of any commissioned officer within his command other than officers of the Regular Army holding permanent or provisional commissions therein. Each member of such board shall be superior in rank to the officer whose qualifications are to be inquired into, and if the report of such board be adverse to the continuance of any such officer and be approved by the President, such officer shall be discharged from the service at the discretion of the President with one month's pay and allowances.

"SEC. 10. That all officers and enlisted men of the forces herein provided for other than the Regular Army shall be in all respects on the same footing as to pay, allowances, and pensions as officers and enlisted men of corresponding grades and length of service in the Regular Army; and commencing June 1, 1917, and continuing until the termination of the emergency, all enlisted men of the Army of the United States in active service whose base pay does not exceed $21 per month shall receive an increase of $15 per month; those whose base pay is $24, an increase of $12 per month; those whose base pay is $30, $36, or $40, an increase of $8 per month; and those whose base pay is $45 or more, an increase of $6 per month: Provided, That the increases of pay herein authorized shall not enter into the computation of continuous-service pay.

"SEC. 11. That all existing restrictions upon the detail, detachment, and employment of officers and enlisted men of the Regular Army are hereby suspended for the period of the present emergency.

"SEC. 12. That the President of the United States, as Commander in Chief of the Army, is authorized to make such regulations governing the prohibition of alcoholic liquors in or near military camps and to the officers and enlisted men of the Army as he may from time to time deem necessary or advisable: Provided, That no person, corporation, partnership, or association shall sell, supply, or have in his or its possession any intoxicating or spirituous liquors at any military station, cantonment, camp, fort, post, officers' or enlisted men's club, which is being used at the time for military purposes under this act, but the Secretary of War may make regulations permitting the sale and use of intoxicating liquors for medicinal purposes. It shall be unlawful to sell any intoxicating liquor, including beer, ale, or wine, to any officer or member of the military forces while in uniform, except as herein provided. Any person, corporation, partnership, or association violating the provisions of this section or the regulations made thereunder shall, unless otherwise punishable under the Articles of War, be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and be punished by a fine of not more than $1,000 or imprisonment for not more than 12 months, or both.

"SEC. 13. That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized, empowered, and directed during the present war to do everything by him deemed necessary to suppress and prevent the keeping or setting up of houses of ill fame, brothels, or bawdy houses within such distance as he may deem needful of any military camp, station, fort, post, cantonment, training, or mobilization place, and any person, corporation, partnership, or association receiving or permitting to be received for immoral purposes any person into any place, structure, or building used for the purpose of lewdness, assignation, or prostitution within such distance of said places as may be designated, or shall permit any such person to remain for immoral purposes in any such place, structure, or building as aforesaid, or who shall violate any order, rule, or regulation issued to carry out the object and purpose of this section shall, unless otherwise punishable under the Articles of War, be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and be punished by a fine of not more than $1,000, or imprisonment for not more than 12 months, or both.

"SEC. 14. That all laws and parts of laws in conflict with the provisions of this act are hereby suspended during the period of this emergency."

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, there are only a few Senators present——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST] has been recognized.

Mr. GRONNA. I simply rise to suggest that we ought to have a quorum here. This is a very important bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The roll will be called.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Gallinger	New	Smith, Md.
Bankhead	Gerry	Norris	Smoot
Beckham	Gronna	Owen	Sterling
Brandegee	Hale	Page	Stone

Mr. KING. I desire to announce that the junior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. VARDAMAN] is detained from the Chamber on official business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-seven Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I wish to premise what I have to say by stating that I shall vote for the adoption of the conference report. Nevertheless I am grievously disappointed that the conferees have left out of the bill an amendment adopted by the Senate, which I shall denominate the Fall amendment, and which I ask the Secretary to read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

SEC. 9. The President is hereby authorized, and the Secretary of War directed, to call into the service of the United States, by enlistment for the term of the present war, three or more regiments of mounted volunteers, in addition to any other forces herein or otherwise provided, such mounted volunteers to be selected from men between the ages of 18 and 45 years, and under the provisions of section 3 hereof, and to be used in protecting property and citizens along the southern border of the United States, and also to be used in any foreign country, as the President may direct.

SEC. 10. The President is hereby authorized to appoint officers for such volunteer force, making appointment from the members of such volunteers as shall have heretofore served in the Ranger or police forces of the southern border States or as peace officers of the counties or municipalities thereof.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, it will be observed from the reading of the amendment which the Senate adopted when the bill was under consideration that it proposed that certain mounted troops should be enlisted. The purpose of the amendment was that these mounted volunteers should guard the southwest border of this Republic. I do not wish to make any invidious distinction, but I think the American people would feel perfectly secure with respect to the southwest border if the States of Arizona, California, Texas, and New Mexico were to organize three or more regiments of mounted volunteers.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arizona yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. ASHURST. Certainly. I am going to be very brief, but I yield to the Senator.

Mr. STONE. Just a question: Does the Senator consider the situation to which he refers as a present emergency?

Mr. ASHURST. Well, Mr. President, those of us who live on the southwestern border generally consider that a certain domain south of us is always an emergency. I am not going to discuss the Mexican question, because we all have our ideas and all have our views, and they have been expressed here at some length, except to say that I think the Senate conferees were most unfortunate in that they were unable to hold for us this amendment. I am not, however, going to join in any clamor against the conferees. They have taken a piece of legislation which was new and which covered a heretofore untraveled field and they have brought back a very substantial report, and the wonder is that they have agreed as quickly as they have, in view of the enormous difficulties confronting them. But I could not be silent upon this occasion and fail to express the extreme disappointment that must come and does come to all of the people who live on the southwestern border, and who know the parlous and, I might say, the dangerous position in which we are always placed there with respect to Mexico.

Adverting to the atlas, which I have in front of me, it will be observed that from Brownsville, Tex., following the Rio Grande up to where the New Mexico line intersects it, and then following westward and northwestward at times to the Pacific Ocean, we have 1,400 miles—I am not attempting to be accurate, but in round numbers 1,400 miles—of international line, and almost every mile of it may at times be regarded as hostile territory. It is over three times longer than the French lines where the entente and Teutonic allies are fighting now.

Mr. President, assume, for instance—I will begin on the California side—the situation with respect to the boundary line between California and Lower California. A great reclamation project is there, the wonderful and productive Imperial Valley, where a hostile force of only a few men, with a few pounds of powder, could within an hour do damage to the people and to our Government of not less than $100,000,000 in amount. This amendment provides, among other things, that these troopers shall guard the border.

Passing eastward, we come to the town of Yuma, in Arizona, just north of where the Colorado River flows into the Gulf of California. Passing farther eastward, we reach the town of Nogales, in Arizona, where the international line passes through the town. Passing on still farther eastward, we have the very prosperous town of Douglas, with millions of dollars' worth of property within a few rods—not miles, but within a few rods—of the boundary line. The same situation is true right on down to Brownsville. So I must express the extreme disappointment I feel over the fact that this amendment has not been adopted.

I feel, however, that I ought to vote for the conference report, because I do not believe that I should be a party to withholding further from the United States this great piece of legislation simply because one amendment which was most salutary and most necessary has been omitted. I am going to indulge the hope and I am going to believe and I certainly am going to join with others in an effort to see that this legislation is incorporated in some other bill that may pass this Congress.

If this were the only opportunity I could have of securing the adoption and the enactment into law of the Fall amendment, I should feel compelled to vote against the conference report; but after carefully considering the situation, believing that we still have ample and abundant opportunity to have that legislation or some similar legislation enacted, I shall content myself with these remarks and vote for the adoption of the report.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I opposed the bill to the best of my ability when it was before the Senate. My convictions regarding it have not changed a particle. If it were before the Senate now as then, I should antagonize it now as I did then. But it has reached its final stage, in the shape of a conference report, and is thus presented for our ultimate consideration.

I deem it my duty to submit to the will of the majority, as expressed here, when the final vote was taken upon the bill. The vote was overwhelming in its favor, and substantially as it has been reported back from the conference committee. My opposition to it ended when that vote was taken, and I became one of its supporters, because the majority of my associates had so declared. Majorities govern here, and when officially announced they bind us all.

I am not surprised that some who advocated the bill when before the Senate now discover that the draft may become a permanent feature of our military policy through its final enactment. I never doubted but that would be the result, once it became ingrafted even for a temporary exigency upon our statute books. The fight for compulsory military service, Mr. President, began long ago. It is much older than this bill. Its advocates have successfully taken advantage of the present crisis to secure a majority for it in both Houses, a vote but for which crisis never could have been secured. I do not know of a league or an association in this country, by whatever title it may be known, whether it be an army and navy league, a national-security league, a national-defense league, or any other of the many high-sounding voluntary militant organizations which is not and which has not been devoted—I have no doubt sincerely and earnestly—to the final elimination of the volunteer system and to the permanent substitution for it of a conscriptive system. So I am not surprised that it now appears that the bill as reported from the conference committee should be changed if we would prevent that consequence. But the change, Mr. President, will not prevent it. The same influences—and I am not criticizing them—which place this bill upon the statute books will see that it becomes a permanent feature of our Military Establishment. But I do not complain, for such was the warning I tried to give when, if heeded, we might have prevented the change.

I shall not delay the consideration of this bill a moment. I think, from what I have heard here, that the committee of conference have, in some features of their report, exceeded their powers—not designedly, not willfully, but evidently because it seemed essential to bring the conference to a close and obtain final action upon the bill without further delay. I shall, therefore, notwithstanding this fact, which would prompt me to oppose the conference report under other conditions, vote favorably on the report when the debate closes and a vote is taken.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, I made some remarks upon this bill when it passed this body originally, or at least when the Senate prepared a bill and sent it to the House. Something has been said again to-day that was urged at that time about the great emergency which exists, and the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], for whom we all have both admiration and great respect, announced to some of those who were not advocating this conference report that there is where they divided from him; that he was in favor of immediate action, and they apparently were not. I announced at the time the bill was presented to the Senate that there was nothing of an emergency nature about it except in the first two or three lines, where the word "emergency" was printed. I hold to that opinion yet. In fact, it has been confirmed and strengthened by the action of the conferees, and by other subsequent events.

Mr. President, in 1914 the Congress of the United States adopted a war measure for exactly this emergency or any other emergency which might come up. It did it during the life of this administration, and a majority of the present Members of the Senate were then Members of the Senate. That law is yet on the statute books. It has not been repealed or amended in any respect. It was put there for exactly this emergency. All that was necessary was, in the adoption of the declaration of war, where the President was authorized to use the land and naval forces of this country, to authorize him to put into effect the machinery of the law upon the statute books. But no! The War Department of this Government, instead of regarding this as an emergency necessitating immediate action and the calling into the field of additional troops, prepared an entirely new measure for the creation of an army. Absolutely ignoring the laws then upon the statute books, which they themselves had requested Congress to pass, they prepared a new measure and submitted it to this body; and now, when this is the first opportunity which has been presented to us for discussing any proposition involved in this conference report, we are told that we must not take time; that those of us who care to discuss it at all are standing in the way of action by this Government. But I for one, Mr. President, as a Member of this body, would prefer at least to hear the Members of the legislative branch criticize some other branch of the Government rather than themselves for dilatoriness in this emergency.

I voted for the declaration of war. I believed that we were confronted with an emergency. I wanted to act then, and I want to act now. This bill does not intend action. With relation to the Regular Army and to the National Guard forces, which are so often referred to here by Senators in this debate, it gives no more authority to the President of the United States with reference to the increase of the members of those two forces than he has under the law now, word for word and line for line. It does give him additional authority to put into effect the draft system with reference to both those bodies as well as the new body; but in so far as creating any other forces is concerned, in so far as adding one man to the National Guard or to the Regular Army is concerned, it does not so do, and does not so pretend to do. You propose to raise the other forces by draft, but, according to the plans being sent out now through the public press and through correspondence from the War Department, of those who are registered none will be required to report even prior to September 1, and then you say that we should not take a few hours' time to discuss this measure!

Mr. President, I resent the attacks continually being made upon this body by those who are accusing the Congress of the United States of being guilty of dilatoriness in this great emergency, and insisting that the Congress shall give additional power, so that the administrative department of this Government may act. The present laws on our statute books and the Constitution of the United States, after a declaration of war, give practically unlimited powers to the President of the United States. For five years we have been giving to every department or department head every extraordinary power which has been requested of this body. We have offered to the Navy and the Army more money than they would accept. To-day they do not want an army summoned into the field immediately, because they have not the ammunition to place in the guns, nor the guns to place in the hands of the men; and that is not the fault of the Congress of the United States. They are drilling men now in training camps with broomsticks. A Senator near me facetiously suggests that we might go into executive session. I shall possibly have that suggestion made once or twice more before I have concluded my remarks.

Mr. President, I am not going to reiterate what I said when this measure was before Congress; but I did, in opening my remarks, suggest that other matters which had occurred since this bill passed the Senate had influenced me and had confirmed my objections to the bill as it was when it passed. I want to repeat what I then said—that I was in favor of raising a million men immediately, and not 500,000, by calling for 500,000 volunteers and then placing in the hands of the President of the United States the authority to draft into the service the cowards and the slackers who would not serve. But I referred also to the fact, sir, that there have been arguments in this Chamber long years ago as to the constitutionality of any conscription for foreign service. I stated then that I would not dwell at any length upon that point, and I do not intend now to occupy the time of the Senate at any length in arguing this constitutional provision. As I said then I say again, the United States of America has fought two wars on foreign soil, and not by conscripts. It has used the conscription authority twice, and only upon American soil; and there was good reason, and is yet good reason, why this policy should be followed at this time.

We are not a homogeneous people. We are a Nation of more than 100,000,000 people from all the other countries of the world. Millions of former German citizens and their immediate descendants are now loyal citizens of the United States of America. Hundreds of thousands of the former citizens of Holland and their immediate descendants constitute the Dutch portion of our population. Hundreds of thousands of Norwegians, Swedes, Danes, and other Scandinavians inhabit particularly the Northwestern States of this Union. Some numbers of thousands of former citizens of Spain and their immediate descendants inhabit portions of this country; and you propose to draft those citizens into the service against their will to fight, it may be, not for American principles, not for the safety of the United States of America, but because of some idealistic theories held by some man of prominence in the United States.

Volunteers, yes. Mr. President, there is no man in the United States of America who has more love for the French people than I have; but would I drag the soldiers or the men of the United States of America into the bloody ditches in France for the purpose of restoring Alsace and Lorraine? In the case of volunteers who desired to go, I would cheer their departure and speed it; but I would not drag a German of the first generation or a naturalized German citizen to France for the purpose of tearing down the house of Hohenzollern or an Austrian to eject from the throne of Austria a Hapsburg. To fight in the trenches of France as our first line of defense for the safety of this Nation is one proposition. To fight for the freedom of the Dardanelles is another. I would welcome, possibly, volunteers to eject the unspeakable Turk from Europe, but so long as I have a vote I will not conscript an American citizen, possibly a former Turk or of the first generation, for that purpose.

We are justified in going to conscription upon one theory, and one alone, and that is the present national necessity of saving our own institutions, preserving our own freedom and our form of government. Upon that theory alone are we justified in sending our soldiers, either conscripts or volunteers, across the seas. When we are asked to send men upon any other theory, I say, as an American citizen—and, as I claim, as loyal and patriotic as any man in the administrative department, or any other member of this department, or any other citizen of the United States—that I will go to any extreme, conscript every man, every doddering grandfather and every child out of the cradle, for the preservation of this Government and its institutions; but I will never vote to conscript an American citizen to fight a war against a people or against a Government simply because we do not happen to agree that theirs is the proper form of government. Fight for democracy, yes; fight the world for our democracy; but I am no Don Quixote, proposing to reform the world. Some people prefer, apparently, the form of government established in Germany, and I, for one, except as Prussianism threatens our safety, will not conscript an American citizen to tear down the Kaiser.

Therefore I favored the volunteer system, that the President of the United States might take volunteers who, understanding the entire situation, understanding his utterances as he has made them before this body and before the public, understanding his ideals, could, if they chose, proceed to Europe to fight for such ideals, and I believe—that, however, is my personal conviction—to fight there for the security and safety of this country. I can judge of that for myself, and volunteer or not for such service, as I please; but I leave to every other American citizen the privilege of saying whether or not he shall volunteer because the present administration, and possibly the majority of the people of the United States, do not like the Prussian form of government.

Mr. President, one of the matters that I refer to which has occurred since the passage of this bill is set forth in the RECORD of this body for May 14, on page 2364. The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] had an amendment then pending which contained restrictions upon the provision, which, at the request of the administrative department, the Senate had placed in the so-called espionage bill, vesting the President of the United States with power to embargo certain products or shipments from this country.

Among other things contained in these limitations was this:

> Nor shall such power so conferred upon the President be used to interfere with the neutral rights of any neutral nation or to coerce the Government of any such neutral nation, directly or indirectly, to engage or participate in the existing war.

I find the remarks of one of the Senators who is favoring the passage of this bill following this amendment which lead me to believe that the intended use of this embargo might be to bring about the change from a neutral condition to that of war of one or the other of the present neutral countries as a matter of national self-defense. The power to embargo certain products to a neutral country when necessary for the defense of this country, in my judgment, is vested, and the authority should be granted, and therefore I voted for that proposition.

But, sir, if the effect of placing in force this embargo is to force the people of Spain or Holland into this war upon one side or the other, and if, nearing of the fate of Serbia, Roumania, and Belgium, they, in self-defense being compelled to embark in the war on one side or the other, with the examples which I have mentioned before them, believed that self-preservation demanded that they should ally themselve with Germany, I do not want to send a Spanish or a Dutch citizen from the United States to fight Spain or Holland, each of which has attempted to maintain her neutrality. Certainly will I not vote to send him to Holland or Spain against his will by the power of conscription.

Should unfortunately Norway, which has always been our friend, be compelled by the operation of the emergency legislation which you have been compelled to pass, or which at least you have passed, to cast her lot in this war with ourselves or with Germany—should that be her unfortunate condition by virtue of the working of the embargo act with which we have empowered the President, and should unfortunately for us her lot be cast with Germany because of the fear of the fate of Belgium and of Servia and Roumania, because we are not prepared to protect her from such a fate, I shall not vote to conscript citizens of Minnesota, Michigan, the Dakotas, and other States of this Union who may be of Norwegian descent, and against his will force this citizen to fight against his relatives and his former Government in a war brought about by the use of power which you have given to the President of the United States. Should, even in self-defense, Norway, Sweden, Denmark, and every other country now remaining neutral be forced into this war on the side of Germany, irrespective of the reasons which they might give, I would send volunteers across the sea to fight them, but I would not conscript a Norwegian to fight Norway, nor a Swede to fight Sweden, nor a Dane to fight Denmark on the idealistic theory advanced by the President of the United States and others in this country, when that war was brought about by our own action or the arbitrary action of the President of the United States under the authority vested in him by your law. Volunteers; yes. Conscripts for that purpose; no. Conscript them to defend our country against the attack of the combined world; yes. Take them from the cradle to the grave and force them into the ranks in defense of their country, but if they will not volunteer do not force them to take foreign service, certainly not unless in absolute necessary defense of this country.

Mr. President, let the great American people have an opportunity to say whether they want this war carried to European shores for purposes such as are expressed by the President of the United States even recently. I, of course, have no knowledge of the authenticity of this published statement of the President in speaking to the Red Cross on, I believe, the 13th of this month. I take it from the Washington Post of the 13th. I shall only read this extract. As I said, whether it is authentic or not I do not pretend to know; I take it as a quotation from the paper:

> We have gone in with no special grievance of our own, because we have always said that we were the friends and servants of mankind. We look for no profit. We look for no advantage. We shall accept no advantage out of this war.

If the war be fought not for self-preservation, if it is to be fought for the idea of Mr. Wilson or anyone else, then let it be fought by such volunteers as he can rally under his banner and not be fought by conscripts whom you force into the ranks.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GALLINGER in the chair). Does the Senator from New Mexico yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. FALL. For a question.

Mr. LEWIS. May I ask the Senator if he happens to have that speech in his hand. I observe in the public RECORD a distinguished Member of the House charged that the President of the United States said in that speech that we, America, have no issue, no grievance. May I ask the Senator if there is such an expression as that in the speech?

Mr. FALL. I have just read it.

Mr. LEWIS. I just came in. I did not hear it.

Mr. FALL. I will read it again for the benefit of the Senator:

> We have gone in with no special grievance of our own, because we have always said that we were the friends and servants of mankind. We look for no profit. We look for no advantage. We shall accept no advantage out of this war.

Mr. LEWIS. I take it, if the Senator will pardon me, and it will not interfere with his speech, surely the President of the United States did not mean we did not have a grievance. That has been recounted often here and of the world's obligations the great grievance we have. I take it the President must have meant our grievance was not that of others who were fighting for the same common cause.

Mr. FALL. Of course, I do not know what the President had in his mind. I know this, that a short time ago he appeared before the Senate of the United States and he said there would or should be no peace with victory. Does the Senator recall that? Now, I understand he holds to the theory that there will be no sheathing of the sword until the Hohenzollerns are driven from Germany and the Hapsburgs from the Austrian throne and all the world a democracy. The Senator must pardon me if I can not follow the President of the United States in his mental acrobatic feats, and I say that without any disrespect to him.

Mr. LEWIS. If the Senator will pardon me, I do not think it would be fair to the able Senator from New Mexico to intrude myself at this time in his speech in defense of the President, or, rather, in justification of him. Therefore I can not reply to his observation at this time, but later, if the necessity arises, I will offer my version.

Mr. FALL. I want to congratulate the President of the United States upon the fact that the eminent Senator spent an hour or more in attempting to translate the President's former speech in this body, and I realize that the President could not have an abler interpreter.

Mr. LEWIS. Perhaps more will be said later, Mr. President.

Mr. FALL. Now, Mr. President, I have other objections to this conference report than those which I have just been announcing and which are conclusive, to such an extent that had it not been that this conference report carries an amendment for 100,000 volunteers I should have voted for the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin when it was offered here.

Carrying that amendment for 100,000 volunteers, I should say now, Mr. President, that for the reasons given and those which I shall give later, I shall ask the Senate of the United States when a vote comes on this conference report to excuse me from voting. If it will not do so, I shall vote against the adoption of the report.

Mr. President, we are placing a new military law upon the statute book, while ample power could be given the President by mere resolution to place the machinery which we have at present in operation.

I took occasion to quote from an eminent authority, often appealed to here by those who oppose the volunteer system, in a speech which I made when the bill was pending in the Senate before, and that is Gen. Upton. I called attention then, and I am going to trespass upon the time of the Senate again to read three lines from Upton's report into the RECORD. On page 11 he says:

> Battles are not lost alone on the field; they may be lost beneath the dome of the Capitol, they may be lost in the Cabinet, or they may be lost in the private office of the Secretary of War.

Not only are we commanded to change our entire military system under the whip of emergency, but I am reminded that there has been a good deal of controversy in the War Department itself within recent months as to the organization there of the Military Establishment of the United States.

Congress provided for a General Staff in 1903, and in 1916, the last expression of this body on this subject, by section 5 it was thought by many eminent authorities that powers vested or exercised by the Chief of the General Staff under the provisions of the act of 1903 were taken away or curtailed so that the Secretary of War himself came into direct contact not through the Chief of Staff but in direct contact through the heads of the different departments with those departments himself.

The Judge Advocate General, Gen. Crowder, for whose opinion I have great respect, decided that the act of 1916, section 5, changed the law of 1903. The two opinions are contained in the annual report of the Secretary of War for the year 1916. The Secretary of War overruled Gen. Crowder and declares in effect that section 5 of the law of 1916 meant nothing, and that the Militay Establishment should be the President, the Secretary of War, and the Chief of Staff, the Chief of Staff to go to the different departments and through him alone should the Secretary of War be informed as to what was going on and be advised as to the proper course in all military matters.

Therefore we have existing at present a Military Department, the Chief of Staff of which is a military man. The Secretary of War acts for the President. So between the different departments, for instance, the War College and the General Staff itself in the Military Establishment of this Government, the Chief of Staff is the man who reaches the ear of the President.

Remember what Upton says, "That battles are lost in the office of the Secretary of War," not alone by the troops in the field, that they are lost in the Cabinet, and yet you are placing the lives of all the boys in this country in the hands of the Chief of Staff of the United States Army. Through him and through him alone the President, as Commander in Chief acts, it makes no difference what complaints there may be in the War College.

I want to say to you, Mr. President, that I believe the younger officers in the Regular forces of the United States will compare favorably in intelligence and in learning and in necessary scientific attainments of a military character with the regulars or irregulars or any other force under heaven. I say, however, that you have to-day in your Military Establishment men without necessary experience. I have seen criticisms on the proposed Roosevelt division, and I have heard them here voiced upon the theory that Roosevelt did not have the necessary military training to enable him to command a brigade or a division. I call your attention to his war record. You will find that in actual battle Theodore Roosevelt served as lieutenant colonel while the Chief of Staff never had a higher rank than major.

I am calling your attention to these matters because I propose to illustrate exactly the point that I make. One reason for which I fear the establishment of this military scheme ingrafted upon our democracy and denounce it, is a reason for the fact that I have asked the Congress of the United States to give to the people upon the border of this country a force through which they could be protected in their lives and in their property. My request was granted by this body by a 2 to 1 vote.

I shall hurry along, Mr. President. I am reminded, however, before I go into this latter proposition fully that my motives in offering this "border-patrol" amendment have been questioned. In one of the papers, sometimes called the mouthpiece of the present administration, I find this. It is in the New York World, on the front page, under date of May 9, "Special from Washington":

> No understanding has been reached on the Harding amendment for divisions of volunteers. The prospects are that it will be thrown out——
> In conference.
> The Fall amendment for volunteers to patrol the Mexican border has aroused many Democrats in Texas and other border States, who charge that an effort to play politics is being made by Senator FALL. Great pressure is being exerted to force the Harding and Fall amendments out of the selective-draft bill.

Mr. President, a "charge" such as this is a very safe one to make. I have been unable to compose my mind to such a condition that I can believe that there was a word of truth in the statement contained in the World, because, of course, anyone who makes such a charge would, except for his absolute cowardice, be a fit recruit for the crew of the German submarine that sank the Lusitania, and which sent women and babies of this country to their watery grave. Any paper which would publish a "charge" of this kind, of course, simply establishes the fact in the mind of any impartial man that it is much more desirous of making a political partisan point than of conveying the truth to its readers through its columns.

Enough of that. I shall undertake before closing my remarks to put into the RECORD some documents and leave to the senders of these telegrams and letters the answer to the statement contained in the World.

I am criticized by some of my strong friends because I have no confidence in the present Military Establishment of the United States. I have none. Let me state that as emphatically as possible, and I fear that only through some great national disaster or humiliation will the people of this country be brought to their senses. Battles, as Upton says, are lost "in the private office of the Secretary of War."

Now, let me just review the little war which we have had. Remember that the Judge Advocate General of the United States Army has decided that a state of war existed on the Mexican border. On March 9 of this last year the people of the town of Columbus, in the State of New Mexico, 3 miles from the Mexican border, were resting peacefully in their beds, secure in the belief that they were being protected by the Regular soldiers of the United States under one of the Regular officers of the United States, sent there for that purpose. They knew that the Regular forces of the United States had been notified three days, two days, and one day before that Villa intended an attack upon Columbus. They knew it through the press. They knew it through the statements of Gen. Gavira of the Carranza army in the city of Juarez. They knew it through the statement of Garcia, the Mexican consul, that he himself had not only telephoned to Gen. Pershing to warn him the day before of this attack but that not being satisfied, so that his record might remain clear, he had written him a note that Columbus was going to be attacked.

I wish that you Senators would view with me the scene of that attack and see it as I see it now. This little town upon a sloping plain has only one hillock, a high point, within miles of it, and that almost in the town itself, a lookout point which any man would naturally have chosen and which since the attack has been occupied night and day by the United States forces as a point of observation. Approximately 300 Regular soldiers, Cavalry, were in camp on the south side of the railroad, the town being situated on the northern side; but few if any more than their own number, the Mexican bandits came across the international border to the town 3 miles within United States territory, planted their machine guns within a few feet of the hospital occupied by United States soldiers, in all a first sergeant and 10 men, back of which lay the encampment, and sent their murderers into the streets of that quiet little town and set fire to it and murdered the men and women as they ran out of their burning houses.

Mr. President, it may be that the commanding officer did everything humanly possible to avoid this disaster. It may be that he did everything which he thought was necessary. The fact remains that he was not with his forces himself, but was sleeping in his own house up in the town, and was cut off from joining his troops by the fire of the bandits and the citizens attempting to defend themselves. The fact remains that women and men were shot down in the streets and their homes burned down while under the protection of the national forces under Regular Army officers.

Of course, sir, it is idle in me to say it, but I will guarantee that if you will give me the men I have asked for I will take 25 of them and no thousand Mexican bandits will ever massacre the people in another quiet town in New Mexico, because every man will sleep with his six-shooter in his hand and his rifle by his side, and when he rises he will pour from the muzzle of his gun a stream of fire which will drive back any bandit; and the bandits know it.

There is not an ex-sheriff, an ex-ranger, or an ex-policeman who would not have gone on this high point there, from which he could observe the country for miles. We did not occupy it, although within 65 yards of the American customhouse, but Pancho Villa took his stand there in person and directed the attack. I believe that our Chief of Staff once expressed great admiration for the military qualities of Pancho Villa. I do not wonder that to our Chief of Staff and some of our Regular Army officers Villa appears a second Napoleon, a genius of warfare.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Mexico yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. FALL. I yield.

Mr. STONE. I have myself thought that Villa was present at that outrageous tragedy to which the Senator refers, but I have seen it so specifically denied that I wondered in the interest of real truth of history whether he was there. The Senator says he was. Is he expressing a mere opinion, or is he basing that opinion upon authentic information?

Mr. FALL. I am basing it, I may say to the Senator, upon the court records. Of course I know the Senator asks the question in good faith.

Mr. STONE. I do.

Mr. FALL. I base it upon the court records, the sworn evidence in the trial of several of Villa's men in the courts of Luna County, in Deming, who were convicted. They testified that Villa not only made the attack but he was engaged in the massacre; they testified that Villa was standing on the hill with the horse holders, and commanded them when the attack took place, and directed the attack. That was also testified to by a little boy of 12 years of age who had his leg shot off, or his leg was amputated after being wounded in this fight. His reasons for being there, as given in the evidence, was to the effect that Villa himself personally had come to his father's house on the way to Columbus and had forced him and his father to go along with him and bear arms, and that he stayed with Villa all during the fight. When the American Cavalry horses were stampeded and driven out by the bandits he thought they were American Cavalry, and he turned and ran and a machine-gun bullet caught him in the leg. This is practically the evidence in the court trial.

Mr. President, I want to call your attention to another incident of this great campaign which we have carried on under our present Military Establishment. There was published in the border papers on the American side, in the El Paso and other papers, including the San Antonio Express, a telegram on the 16th day of June, 1916—Gen. Pershing was then in Mexico at the head of our military expedition—and I take from the pages of the San Antonio Express the quotation which I shall now read. This was published, I may say, in the Chihuahua newspaper, the official paper of Trevino, and is the republication and translation in the newspapers of the United States:

TREVINO SAYS ANY MOVE EXCEPT NORTH MEANS HOSTILITIES.

CHIHUAHUA, Mexico, June 16.

Gen. Jacinto Trevino, commander of the division of the north, gave out for publication this afternoon the following message, which he has been directed to transmit to Gen. J. J. Pershing:

"I am instructed to inform you, by First Chief V. Carranza, that any movement of American troops from their present lines to the south, east, or west will be considered as an overt act and will be the signal for hostilities."

The feeling is general in official circles in Chihuahua that a clash with the United States forces, precipitating fighting all along the line, is only a short time away.

On the 18th of June there was published the following in the American papers on this side of the line. I have heard that some one had been criticized for allowing this to leak:

PERSHING GIVES CURT ANSWER TO TREVINO THREAT.

I have not received any orders to remain stationary or withdraw. If I see fit to send troops in pursuit of bandits to the south, east, or west in keeping with the object of this expedition I shall do so.

If any attack is made on any part of my forces while performing such duties, the entire military strength of the expedition will be used against the attacking forces.

Gen. Trevino, as commander in chief of the de facto government's troops in the north, will be held responsible for Mexican forces within striking distance of the American forces.

If there is any doubt as to the authenticity of these documents—of course, I have not seen them—I think that such doubt will be removed from the mind of any Senator who may have access to the archives of the War Department.

Mr. President, Trevino challenged Pershing on the 16th; Pershing accepted Trevino's challenge on the 18th; and on the 21st Trevino's forces at Carrizal shot Boyd and Adair, wounded Morey, and killed a large number of troopers who had been sent out under orders from Gen. Pershing. Was the entire force of the military expedition used against Trevino? No. Was any part of it so used? No. Why not, I ask?

I say to you that from my knowledge of J. J. Pershing there is no braver American soldier living to-day. I say to you that, in my judgment, there is no more honorable man living to-day; that he is no braggart; that never would he have sent that reply to Trevino without fully intending to make good that threat; that never would he have sent it unless he intended to enforce it; and never would he have refrained from enforcing it except that its enforcement would have cost him his career, his life. I make the challenge here now that he was ordered from the secrecy of the office of the Chief of Staff or of the Secretary of War or the Cabinet room not to carry out his threat to avenge the death of those who died there in the performance of their duty under his orders, and not to seek to rescue those who were carried to the filthy jails of Chihuahua, and who, when sent home, were clothed in rags or with blankets thrown around them to hide their nakedness.

I say to you that in all the annals of the history of any self-respecting Nation there never was written so black a chapter as was written by Pershing against his will and by the conduct of our military under orders from Washington along the American border.

Why, I ask you, in the name of all that is reasonable, when Tompkins rode into Parral in pursuance of Pershing's orders, and was fired upon and his troopers killed, and when he took up a defensive position on the outside and was driven from it by the overwhelming forces of Carranza's troops, why did he leave his dead unavenged and one soldier missing, who is yet missing from the American Army? Will you tell me that any American officer would not have died in his tracks before he would have submitted to this disgrace unless it had been dictated to him by some one from Washington from the secrecy of the Secretary's office or from the Cabinet room? It could not come from the "Dome of the Capitol" in this instance.

When we had gathered, at great expense, stores of feed for our horses and food for our men at San Geronimo, the farthest point south reached by the expedition, from whence to send out forces from time to time under Howze, Tompkins, and others, why, I ask you, did we retreat like whipped armies, burning our stores behind us at San Geronimo? Why did we abandon our headquarters at Namiquipa, the headquarters for months of the commanding general of that expedition, and when we abandoned them, why did we burn $150,000 worth of American stores, which had been paid for by the money of the American people, and which were necessary for the support of the American troops and cavalry horses in that expedition? Why did we come like whipped curs from Mexico, and then, through our commissioners, grovel at the feet of the Mexican "de facto" leader for three months?

Will you tell me that the Military Establishment of this country, as at present constituted, is fit to be trusted with the lives of our boys, to do with them as they please, under a draft system? Ah, they do not want the volunteer, because the American volunteer is a free man; he still remains a free man and a voter, and he has behind him his friends and his family, who also are voters. He is not in the Regular Army, and he dares, and will always dare, to make his voice heard, whether it is by a round robin against rotten beef or whether it is by direct complaint against paper-soled shoes. The regular staff does not want the volunteer; they want conscripts, whom they can control absolutely under their Regular Army officers, and who will not dare to raise their voices in their own defense.

Something is the matter, Senators, with our Regular Army, not in the rank and file, for no braver men ever lived; there are no more patriotic men.

In the battle at Columbus, when taken entirely by surprise because they were not even properly sentineled, some of those engaged first in the fight were furnished with ammunition, which had been broken out of a locker by a first sergeant, but when they finally succeeded in making their way into the fire zone no troops ever fought better. They administered such a thrashing to Villa that he has never again recovered his prestige, and they can be depended upon to do it again. My whole plea is that their lives be not sacrificed to the red tape of a military despotism, such as is being established in the War Department in Washington, D. C., United States of America.

Mr. President, I had taken up the question involved in this amendment providing for a "border patrol" with the War Department. It was not a new matter; it was not simply the thought of a moment. When I offered it here I had received advice upon it from a graduate of West Point who had served with the Indian scouts in the Crook campaign for four years and in every expedition which Crook made on the border of Mexico, and who had then lived, after resigning from the Army, for 20 years in Mexico, on the northern border, and who knows every foot of the country. Not only, however, did I have his advice, but I went directly, through letters, to the Chief of Staff of the United States Army. Not being able to get anything definite from that source directly, I went to the Secretary of War long before I placed this matter here. On February 6, 1917, I wrote a letter to the Chief of Staff, a portion of which I will not read, but it is open to the inspection of the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs or of any other Senator. I used this language:

Of course you are informed as to conditions along the southern border and in Mexico. I have thought of suggesting to you, and am now doing so, the advisability of providing for certain regiments of mounted infantry for use along the border in the event this country should be drawn into a war with Germany or any other country.

At least three regiments of mounted volunteers could be obtained for service along the border if necessary, but these men will not enter the National Guard, nor would many of the class whom I have in mind join the Regular Army.

Ex-peace officers, rangers, sheriffs, cattlemen, and miners along the border in Arizona, New Mexico, and Texas, who are accustomed to living in the desert country, all more or less disciplined for certain work because of their experience in cattle work, where they must obey orders of the superintendent, foreman, and "straw boss," could make as efficient soldiers and guards for the protection of the border as would any regular Cavalry or other forces. As you know, of course, men for this work should be mounted.

I do not want to interrupt the chairman of the committee, but I thought possibly he might be interested in some of this literature.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. My attention was diverted for a moment.

Mr. FALL. On February 8 I had a letter, a portion of which I shall read, from the Chief of Staff upon this subject, in which he said:

While fully appreciating the efficiency of such men, the provisions of existing law provide only for the organization and use of the Regular Army, the National Guard, and United States Volunteers, and forbid the expenditure of public funds on any but the authorized organizations. The organization of all units of such forces must conform to that provided for the corresponding ones of the Regular Army. Should volunteers be authorized, it is probable that many of the men of whom you speak may be secured in the volunteer organizations.

On the 9th I replied to him, saying that I had called his attention to the fact that the law must be modified, simply with the view that, in the event he agreed to the proposition, I would undertake to assist in modifying the law. To that letter he replied on April 10:

I have your letter of February 9, and will send it down to the War College for recommendation in the case.

Thanking you for your letter, and with best wishes for yourself, I am,

Very sincerely, yours, H. L. SCOTT,
Major General, Chief of Staff.

On the 25th I took up the matter direct with the Secretary of War himself, as I was at that time transmitting to him certain information coming from the border States. In this letter of transmittal I say:

I know something about the Secret Service of the United States along the southern border, and am cognizant to a certain extent of the sources of information of the different departments of this Government in that section of our country.

The Rock Island Road, with its El Paso Southwestern System connections, runs through New Mexico to El Paso, Tex., and thence west into Arizona.

The Santa Fe Road runs through New Mexico to El Paso.

The Southern Pacific Road, from California, runs through New Mexico to El Paso.

The Texas-Pacific runs east and west through the State of Texas to El Paso.

The G. H. & S. A. runs through the State of Texas from Galveston to El Paso.

On each of these roads, from the State of Kansas south, from the east boundary of Texas west, and from California east, practically every section man employed, except the foremen, are Mexicans from the Republic of Mexico, and who are constantly shifting from one place to another, and a majority of whom return two or three times a year to the Republic of Mexico.

Large numbers of old Mexico Mexicans are employed in the cotton fields of Texas, in the mines and upon the farms of New Mexico and Arizona, in the beet-sugar fields of Colorado, and in other sections of our country.

These people are not regarded by our native Mexicans as the equal of the latter.

I speak of that with reference to the exact conditions. 50 per cent of our American population in that section being of Mexican descent—and are regarded by our Mexicans and our citizens generally as constituting a dangerous element in our community, and that from which crimes of a violent character can be expected at any time, and are constantly occurring.

I have called the attention of your department and of the State Department to the necessity of guarding our border, and I again most solemnly warn you of danger, not only from the Mexicans now within our country but from those in Mexico, whether calling themselves Carranzistas or by the name of any other leader.

For more than two years at least two papers have been published in the Republic of Mexico in the Spanish language, through the columns of which Germans have sought to impress the friendship of the German people and the German Government for the Mexicans and the ability and the willingness of Germany and the German people to finance and rehabilitate Mexico.

I can say to you, Senators, that I have copies of those papers in my office, obtained by myself within from 12 to as short a time as 6 months back.

You must know that even recently and now, through confiscations or threatened confiscations and pressure brought to bear by local and so-called governmental officials in Mexico, property of other foreigners is being acquired by Germany in various portions of the Mexican so-called Republic.

I think that reports from agents of the Government in El Paso, Tex., reciting the activities of Germans in Mexico, will have been learned of by the departments here in Washington.

I have suggested to the Chief of Staff here the advisability of amending any Army bill which may be offered by providing for the recruiting of three or more regiments of mounted riflemen to do guard duty along our boder, and particularly in Texas, New Mexico, Arizona, and southern California.

Men for this purpose could be secured immediately, but the age limit should be increased to 50 years.

Men who have been peace officers, Texas rangers, bandits, Indian and Mexican fighters, and who have wiped out the various train-robbing and outlaw bands formerly infesting this country, would gladly serve their country now if called upon for active service in protecting their homes and those of their fellow citizens.

These men can perform the duties which would fall upon them more successfully than would any Cavalry of the United States, any of the Regular forces of the United States, and of the National Guard of the United States, or any new forces to be organized through conscription, draft, or universal service.

I am exceedingly anxious to cooperate with your department, as well as the other departments of this Government, in every way possible.

I used some expression there that might be construed as conveying an intimation that unless the representations should receive proper consideration my cooperation could not be counted upon further than along certain lines, because the lives of my people were at stake.

I had a letter from the Secretary dated April 11, as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, April 11, 1917.

Hon. A. B. FALL,
United States Senate.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I thank you for your letter of the 5th instant, in which you call the attention of the department to the necessity of guarding our border and suggest the recruiting of three or more regiments of mounted riflemen.

The first question is constantly before the department, and I assure you that its importance is fully appreciated. Until Congress authorizes the raising of a military force for purposes of general defense, I deem it unwise for the department to suggest that authority be given it to organize special troops for special duty. I will, however, have careful study made of your suggestion and will give it full consideration when the matter of organizing new units is up for decision.

Very truly,
NEWTON D. BAKER,
Secretary of War.

I have read these extracts, Mr. President, for the purpose of showing to Senators that this, as I have said, is not a new matter, but that it has been presented and has not been turned down directly by the War Department through the Secretary or the Chief of Staff, expressions from both of whom indicate that at the last hearing they were considering this matter, and both recognized the great efficiency of the force I was suggesting.

Mr. President, with reference to my own interest in this matter, I have been accused by the newspapers for a good many years of being guided by personal, private, material, and financial interests, although I think I have not heretofore been accused of being actuated by partisan motives. I have not undertaken to reply and do not intend to reply to such statements. What I have said with reference to the article in the World was just in passing. I do not care anything about what the newspapers say of myself, but in justice to my constituents, as showing their realization of the conditions and their demand for action, I want to read one or two telegrams, and then I shall ask that the others may be printed in the RECORD. I read first the following:

SANTA FE, N. MEX., May 10, 1917.

Hon. ALBERT B. FALL,
Washington, D. C.:

I have been directed by the State legislature—

The State legislature was at that time in special session, called for emergency purposes, war matters, by the governor of the State—

I have been directed by the State legislature to forward to you the following joint memorial adopted by the same:

"To the Congress of the United States:

"The Legislature of the State of New Mexico respectfully memorializes and requests the Congress of the United States to adopt the amendment to the Army bill proposed by Senator ALBERT B. FALL providing for organizing three regiments of volunteer cavalry to be recruited in the States of Arizona, New Mexico, and Texas for service along the Mexican border."

ANTONIO LUCERO, Secretary of State.

I may say to you who may be interested in the matter that Mr. Lucero, secretary of state, is a Democrat.

I have the following telegram from Bisbee, Ariz.:

BISBEE, ARIZ., May 8, 1917.

Senator A. B. FALL,
Washington, D. C.:

This great copper-producing community fully indorses and urges the adoption of your wise amendment to the Senate Army bill. Feel that you have our fullest support.

C. W. ALLEN,
President Warren District Commercial Club.
J. W. WHITE,
President Business Men's Association.

It is possible that the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST] can tell as to the politics of these gentlemen. I read another telegram from Bisbee:

BISBEE, ARIZ., May 8, 1917.

Senator A. B. FALL,
Washington, D. C.:

Representing the mining industry in Arizona, producing 700,000,000 pounds of copper annually, essential to welfare of more than a third of the entire copper output of America, we most vigorously indorse and urge the adoption of your amendment to the Senate Army bill.

J. E. CURRY,
Secretary Arizona Chapter American Mining Congress.

I do not know the politics of Mr. Curry nor of the gentlemen composing the mining congress.

I now read a telegram from the Chamber of Commerce of Douglas, Ariz., one of the great smelting centers; in fact, the great smelting center of the Southwest:

DOUGLAS, ARIZ., May 7, 1917.

Senator FALL,
Washington, D. C.:

The Douglas Chamber of Commerce and Mines asks that you support with all vigor the Fall amendment to the Senate Army bill asking for three regiments of volunteer cavalry for border duty. This is very essential to guard mammoth smelting plants at Douglas, as well as El Paso property.

DOUGLAS CHAMBER OF COMMERCE AND MINES,
By OSCAR K. GOLL, Secretary.

My general information has been that the majority of these cities in Arizona are not only overwhelmingly Democratic in votes, but that practically all their officials are Democrats. That is simply my general information. I think the Senator from Arizona could tell, for instance, whether or not the mayor of Bisbee is a Democrat.

I now read a telegram from the mayor of Bisbee, Ariz.:

BISBEE, ARIZ., May 8, 1917.

Senator A. B. FALL,
Washington, D. C.:

Your amendment to Senate Army bill meets with the fullest indorsement of all the people of this section engaged in the production of copper. We urge its adoption. If it is to be changed make the number of regiments larger.

JACOB I. BRICKSON,
Mayor of Bisbee, Ariz.

Here is a telegram from Albert Steinfeld, whom every old-timer in the Southwest knows. He is from Tucson, Ariz., and his telegram is of the same general tenor and effect.

I have another from O. C. Parker, of Tucson, Ariz.; another from the Tucson Chamber of Commerce, and another from the mayor of Tucson. I am merely making reference to these telegrams, but I shall ask that all of them be published in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, permission is granted.

Mr. FALL. I have another telegram from Peter Corpstein, mayor of the city of Phoenix, politics unknown to present deponent.

Here is one from the Rotary Club of Phoenix, Ariz., by P. C. Gettins, president.

The mayor of Yuma, Ariz.—and I heard the Senator from Arizona a short time ago mention the danger that Yuma might be in—sends the following telegram:

YUMA, ARIZ., May 5, 1917.

Senator A. B. FALL,
Washington, D. C.:

The city of Yuma urges retention of amendment pertaining to recruiting of mounted volunteers for border service. We feel this would be a distinct economical feature and we are glad our State's congressional Members are for it and hope they assist you in getting the amendment adopted.

GEO. MICHELSEN, Mayor.

I have one from the president of the Chamber of Commerce of Phoenix, Ariz.; one from the mayor of Globe, Ariz.; one from another old-timer of Phoenix, who understands something of the conditions on the border; one from Clifton, Ariz., from one of the city officials; one from the superintendent of the Chino Copper Co., at Santa Rita, N. Mex., one of the largest producers of copper in the United States.

I have a telegram from the Chamber of Commerce of Silver City, N. Mex.; another signed by R. L. Young and W. W. Cox, of Las Cruces, N. Mex. I happen to know that Mr. Cox is a Republican and that Mr. Young is one of the most prominent Democratic attorneys in the entire southern part of New Mexico.

I have another telegram from the mayor and city council, as well as the president of the Chamber of Commerce of Deming, N. Mex. I believe that the records of the last election will show that they all voted the Democratic ticket and are in the habit of doing so. I have another from the Silver City National Bank, of Silver City, N. Mex; one from the Silver City Enterprise; one from Frank T. French, president of the Bascom French Co., at Las Cruces; another from the John H. May Grocery Co., at Las Cruces, N. Mex.; another from the Deming Chamber of Commerce; another from the superintendent of the mill of the Chino Copper Co.; another from the Las Cruces Business Men's Association; another from the president of the American National Bank at Silver City; another from Percy Wilson, mayor of Silver City, N. Mex.; another from E. M. Sawyer, manager of the Phelps-Dodge Co. interests at Tyrone, where they are building up one of the great copper camps of the world.

I also have a telegram from George Kingdon, of Jerome, Ariz. Mr. Kingdon was manager of the Cannanea Copper Co.'s interest in Chihuahua, Mexico, and is now at Jerome, Ariz., in the copper business.

Mr. President, I have trespassed upon the time of the Senate in calling particular attention to these telegrams, so that it may be understood that I have been conscientiously, at least, asking the assistance of the Senate in behalf of the people of my section of the country, the people of the border States. We have had a great many arrests. The officers of the secret service have been very busy in New Mexico. Attempts have recently been made to blow up the great Government structure, the Elephant Butte Dam, and attempts have been made to destroy our coal mines. We furnish all the coal to all the railroads and coal and coke to all the copper mines and smelters throughout the Southwest. Threats have been made to blow them up. One-half of the coal miners in New Mexico are citizens of Austria, and the other employees are practically all foreigners. We have been compelled to do our best to guard ourselves. Of course, the blowing up or destruction of coal mines means the consequent retardation, at any rate, of transportation in the event it becomes necessary for the Government to use our roads for transportation. As I have said heretofore, every mile of every railroad for 800 miles from the border is in the hands of Mexicans. Secret-service men who were working with those irresponsible people have seized the plans of the bridges which were to be blown up and have seized dynamite in their possession.

The Regular Army has been stationed at different points along the border. They do not constitute a mobile force. They are entirely incapable of performing the duties such as I have suggested here to the Senate that it was necessary to have performed by some one. Now, sir, I say there has not been a word of objection by anyone to this amendment. The House conferees struck out the so-called Roosevelt proposition for a volunteer force, and struck out this proposition because it was also a volunteer force.

Since that time the conferees have not considered it, although twice the House has sent back to them this bill under instructions.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Mexico yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. FALL. I do.

Mr. REED. Can the Senator give us any information as to why the House asked to have this bill sent back—why they put in the Roosevelt volunteer force, after having voted against it by an overwhelming vote?

Mr. FALL. I can not. I have not the remotest idea what actuated the House. I have not the slightest information upon the subject. I do not understand the trend of the Senator's question.

Mr. REED. The only trend of my question is to get that information. It has been a complete puzzle to me; and as the Senator was speaking about a matter that was germane, I merely asked to ascertain if he knew.

Mr. FALL. I have not the remotest idea and never understood at all what actuated the House. I supposed that they had, as wise men often do, changed their opinion and had decided that they would provide for a hundred thousand volunteers, and so acted and instructed their conferees, who obeyed their instructions.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. They concluded to do the right thing; that is all.

Mr. FALL. And then, when the bill came in here, we had no opportunity, of course the Senator realizes, to consider it until now. Although the conference report twice has been printed here, we never could lay our fingers on it. When it went back into the House, we were informed that the House again rejected it for some reason connected with the pay of the enlisted men and sent it back with instructions; and not only the House conferees but, I think, the Senate conferees obeyed the instructions.

Mr. President, I shall not take the responsibility as one lone man here of asking that this bill be sent back to the conferees. In my judgment, it is a foolish measure at this time, for the several reasons which I have given.

In my judgment, the most meritorious part of the entire bill was that which sought to correct the intolerable conditions existing along the southern border of this country. For five years now we have had the Army, and have it now, to the extent of approximately 40,000 men, along that border. Their faces, except while ordered south during the Pershing expedition, have been turned to this side and not to the other. Their desire to do their duty, their patriotism, is unquestioned; but they can not do it when they are tied down, and when the military forces are placed largely in the hands of the foreign department of this Government.

One of the troubles that you are going to have now is the interference of one department with another in the conduct of this war and the insistence of your regular military organization upon controlling every man in the field, whether in the trenches of France or on the Mexican border. You have got to deal with it sooner or later. Congress raises armies. You do not delegate that power, or you are not supposed to delegate it, to anyone else. You are going to meet these propositions sooner or later, or else you are going to meet a great humiliation; and you are going to meet in the enforcement of the provisions of this bill throughout the country such a storm of protest as you never heard rattle around your ears before.

JEROME, ARIZ., May 9, 1917.

Senator A. B. FALL,
Washington, D. C.:

Think your plan of three regiments of mounted volunteers is fine.

GEO. KINGDON.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, there are three definite objections I have to this bill as reported by the conference committee. One of them relates to the limitation put on the bill by the conferees as to the time when the conscription authorized should certainly end. I am not going to discuss that question now, for the reason that it has been already adequately debated and I think the subject is quite well understood by Senators. I have already spoken about that and I am willing to leave it where it is.

I wish to address myself especially to the seventh subdivision of section 1, which I will read. It is not long:

Seventh. The President is further authorized to raise and maintain by voluntary enlistment, to organize and equip, not to exceed four Infantry divisions, the officers of which shall be selected in the manner provided by paragraph 3 of section 1 of this act: Provided, That the organization of said force shall be the same as that of the corresponding organization of the Regular Army—

If this provision had stopped there it would not have been so objectionable to me as it is. I advocated the conscription policy as against the volunteer policy, and, following the lead of the administration and the Military Committee in that behalf, adhered to the view that the two things could not consistently run on parallel lines; that the one would in large measure disturb the successful administration of the other; still, if this provision had stopped at the point where I ceased reading it would not, as I have said, have been so objectionable to me. But it goes on further to say:

And provided further, That there shall be no enlistments in said force of men under 25 years of age at time of enlisting: And provided further, That no such volunteer force shall be accepted in any unit smaller than a division.

My judgment protests against both of those provisos. The first one I have read, that no one shall be permitted to enlist under the age of 25 years, is due to this mental attitude on my part: If we are going to have enlistments, and that seems to have been determined upon, and if we are going to have a volunteer army, which seems to have been determined upon, why limit the minimum age of enlistment to 25 years? Why permit a vigorous, ambitious, patriotic young man of 25 years to voluntarily offer his services to his country and deny that privilege to one equally well qualified but somewhat younger, say 24 years of age?

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. STONE. Yes.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator knows, I presume, that that is the so-called Roosevelt amendment, which passed this body by a large majority, and while disagreed to by the conference, it went over to the House, where the House adopted it as it is; so that it has really passed both bodies in that way.

Mr. STONE. Yes; I know that.

Mr. WARREN. It is not really within the control of the conferees.

Mr. STONE. I know that. Nevertheless, in a very few words, if I may finish what I have to say on that subject, I express my emphatic dissent to the proposition embraced in that proviso, which denies to young men under 25 years of age the right to enlist voluntarily in the service of the country, while admitting those above that age.

Mr. WARREN. Of course, the Senator knows that they can enlist under that age if they enlist in the Regular Army. In that event they can enlist if they are 18 and over. The provision with regard to these four divisions contains the only restriction of that kind.

Mr. STONE. I fully appreciate what the Senator says, and I have no purpose of entering largely into that field. Take a young man of 24, take a young man of 18 or 19, and he could not get into this volunteer service.

Mr. WARREN. He can get in anywhere except in these four particular divisions authorized in the Roosevelt amendment; that is all.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator for a second?

Mr. STONE. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I want to say to the Senator from Missouri that I think Gen. Custer, when he was a major general and marched down Pennsylvania Avenue with the American troops at the close of the Civil War, was not 25 years of age; and I do not believe there were very many brigadier generals that were 25 years of age at the close of the war.

Mr. STONE. I am not able either to verify or to dissent from the statement made by the Senator. My confidence in his historical reading justifies me in believing that he is substantially accurate.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I think I am right about it.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I voted against the minimum limitation in the bill brought in by the Senator from Oregon of 19 years, fixing the limit for drafting between 19 and 25. I thought 19 was too low. I wanted it 21, and that is what it is now; and I wanted the maximum more than 25, and it is now 30. The drafting age is now between 21 and 30. I am satisfied with that; but I opposed drafting a minor of 19 years or a minor of any age simply because he was not an adult, because he was not a grown man, because he had no voice in these important matters about which we have been legislating, had no influence, and because he was subject under the law to the control of his father as a minor, and I did not believe that the Government of the United States should use its power to go in and take him out of his home nolens volens. But now that has been remedied. Still, Mr. President, if a boy under 21—even 20, 19, or 18—of his own motion and desire should plead to go into the Army to serve his country, and his father and mother were willing, why should he be deprived of that opportunity? So many illustrious examples of the outcome of that very sort of thing in our martial history should make us pause to put that limitation and deprivation upon the patriotic youth of the country. I would not compel them to go, but I would not deny them the right if they wished.

THE ROOSEVELT PROVISO.

But I purpose to speak principally this afternoon with respect to the last proviso I have read. It is this:

And provided further, That no such volunteer force shall be accepted in any unit smaller than a division.

That is the Roosevelt provision, so designated. I want to talk about that. I want to talk about it very deliberately, as expressing my opinion. I do not care whether anybody likes what I am going to say or whether anybody even listens to it; I am going to say it and put it in the RECORD for my own satisfaction, if nothing else.

Mr. President, I am opposed to that provision. I think it is an outrageous thing to put into this law. I am going to talk about Roosevelt, but I am not going to say anything very harsh or bad about him. This is not the occasion to do that. I desire to discuss this Roosevelt business with the utmost conservatism.

Mr. WARREN. As the Senator always does.

Mr. STONE. Not always, but generally. I do not question Mr. Roosevelt's courage or intelligence, but I do question his judgment as a commander of men. I oppose this scheme to authorize him to enlist a large body of volunteers, first, because he is unfit to command; second, because this scheme is both personal and political——

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Oh, no; not political.

Mr. STONE. Yes; political; and the very worst form of politics, too; and, third, because it is a matter of common knowledge that he has no respect for authority, constitutional or otherwise, and is incapable of subordination or obedience.

I.

I say he is unfit to command, and certainly unfit to command a large body of troops like a division or even a brigade. There is nothing in his experience, his training, or his temperament that would fit him for such a command. Mere physical courage, even though possessed to the point of audacity, is not the sole quality, nor even the most important quality, that fits a man in time of war to command and control the lives, the safety, and the health of great bodies of men, whether in camp, on the march, or on the fighting line.

Roosevelt is practically without military training. It is true that for a short time he did command a regiment in the Spanish-American War of 1898—a regiment of very brave men and willing fighters—and I do not deny that he led them courageously into battle, but he did not command them with judgment. As everyone knows, he got his men into a bad hole, where they were in imminent danger of being decimated and cut to pieces, and no doubt they would have been cut to pieces except for a negro regiment, under trained officers of the Regular Army, who came to the rescue and sheltered and saved him and them. By his own course in the only crisis of his brief and unimportant military career he demonstrated such a lack of poise and sound judgment as to make plain his unfitness to command even a regiment.

II.

I charge that this scheme is both personal and political.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I do not believe it, and I do not believe anybody else does.

Mr. STONE. Well, somebody else does.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I do not know about that.

Mr. STONE. Well, we will not get into any controversy about that. I do, and I am sure a good many others do. It is smeared all over with politics and most glaring personal favoritism. Plainly the amendment, which, as I have stated, is very properly called the "Roosevelt amendment"—think of that, a provision in a bill like this called the "Roosevelt amendment"!—was framed with the sole idea that it would exclude everybody but Roosevelt. Is not that true? I am going to show that it is true.

So far as I know, Roosevelt is the only man going out to the country proposing to raise a division—remember that, a division! At first, his offer was to raise a smaller body of volunteers; but his ambition grew with what it fed upon, and when competition threatened the bolder idea of raising a division instead of a brigade took root in his mind. Others offered to raise brigades and regiments, and when this happened the colonel's ambition, unwilling to endure competition, raised itself to the higher level of a division.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Will the Senator let me interrupt him for just a moment?

Mr. STONE. Certainly.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. In view of the charge the Senator makes that this is political, would the Senator mind inserting in his remarks the vote of the Senate on the Roosevelt amendment?

Mr. STONE. I would not mind doing that if I had it at hand this moment, but I have not. I am, however, going to insert the vote of the House relating to this Roosevelt amendment, as expressed on the conference report. I have not the Senate vote at hand. The Senate did vote for the Roosevelt amendment after the House had rejected it. I can not now recall the exact vote. I wish the Senator would furnish me with this data and I would be glad to insert it in my remarks.

Mr. WARREN. I was going to say I hope the Senator would insert it.

Mr. STONE. I will be glad to do so. I want to insert it. I want to be absolutely fair and square about this matter. I am going to insert the House vote on recommitting the bill to the conference committee on account of Roosevelt—to help Roosevelt. I will try to get in the Senate vote also. I not only want the absolute vote but I want the political vote. I want it in that form. I want it to show the political proportions. That will show it is political.

So far as I am advised, Roosevelt is the only man who has offered to enlist a division.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. He is the only man who can raise an army.

Mr. STONE. The Senator observes sotto voce that Roosevelt is the only man who can raise an army. I do not know whether that is true or not—I do not believe it is true—but he is not the only man who can raise a brigade or a regiment.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. There are very few men in private life who could raise a division of soldiers voluntarily.

Mr. STONE. I think he is perhaps one of the few men in private life who might possibly raise a division; he may be the only one who could do so; but there are men who can raise units representing less numbers. What I am objecting to is that you are raising no volunteer force less than a division. I am speaking of the fact that he is the only man proposing to raise a division. Can not some patriotic man be permitted to raise less than a division? Many are offering to do that. It is a striking fact, very peculiar, that the progenitors of this scheme, the authors of this amendment, so framed the amendment as to provide that volunteers should not be accepted in units less than a division. The very language of the amendment discloses its purpose; I had almost said its sinister purpose, but I refrain from using that qualifying phrase. If there were any doubt of that, the speeches made by the Senators who specially favored this amendment prove conclusively what their purpose was, that is, to give Col. Roosevelt a chance to exploit himself as the one great volunteer hero of the war.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. And shut out everybody else.

Mr. STONE. It would give him a monopoly of opportunity. Both the amendment and the supporting speeches show that the scheme is intended only—I want somebody to disprove this statement if it be untrue—that the scheme is intended only to promote the personal ambitions and fortunes of Theodore Roosevelt.

The speeches of Senators HARDING, LODGE, and JOHNSON of California, for all of whom I have the greatest personal respect, to say nothing of the speeches of other Senators, show beyond peradventure that the amendment was intended to enable Mr. Roosevelt to do a certain thing. They did not say it, but I say that the whole trend of it, the significance of it is to promote Roosevelt's ambitious personal plans, and we all know that no man in America could utilize a chance of that kind to better advantage.

Now for a question, and I am sorry the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] is not here, because I can quarrel with him in a better humor, it may be, than with some others, because of my long service with him. Among the advocates of this Roosevelt amendment is there one who is a sincere advocate—the Senator from Massachusetts professes to be one of those—of the conscription plan as embodied in the Chamberlain bill, who would have favored such a provision as that in question as an amendment if it had been primarily understood and intended to enable Gen. Scott, Gen. Pershing, or any man, either in private or military life, to raise a division of volunteers? No. I say all of them would have said—the Senator from Massachusetts, especially, would have said—something like this: "If we are to establish the conscription plan outlined in the bill, then you must not send out men authorized to raise large bodies of volunteers." All of them would have denounced the two things as inconsistent. But since Col. Roosevelt is clamoring for this special privilege his friends, including the senior Senator from Massachusetts, rise in the Senate without blushing to demand it for him, and they so frame the measure as to practically exclude everybody else and give Roosevelt a monopoly.

My friend the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN], the chairman of the committee, said he would like to have the vote of the Senate inserted in my remarks. He has agreed to prepare the statement in the way he wishes, although I reserve the right to review it in substance if not in form. I will insert the Senate vote anyhow. I will insert it at the end of my remarks.

This brings me to the partisan phases of this discussion. I have heard much said to the effect that partisanship in this fateful hour of our national life and struggle should be put aside. I agree to that. Is this Roosevelt business partisanship? How are you going to determine that? Here is one way to determine it: The House of Representatives, the chairman of the committee told us only a few minutes ago what we already knew, had first voted down this Roosevelt amendment, which afterwards the Senate adopted. Then, afterwards, in the deliberations of the conference committee, it was agreed to eliminate Roosevelt from the bill, and the conferees so reported to both Houses. But there was a rally of Roosevelt's partisan forces in the House of Representatives, and they succeeded in reversing the former action of the House, and so sent the matter back to conference.

The Senator from Oregon, speaking of it this very afternoon, when his attention was called to this situation, said without qualification that the whole business was a play of politics. Let us see. On the motion in the House to recommit the bill with instructions to the House conferees to stand for the Senate Roosevelt amendment, contrary to the previous action of the House, the vote stood as follows: Ayes—that is, in favor of recommitting with instructions to accept the Roosevelt amendment put on in the Senate—Republicans, 171; Democrats, 44; total, 215. The per cent of Republicans voting for this Roosevelt amendment is 80, of the Democrats voting for the Roosevelt amendment, 20 per cent. I wish here to say that in these tabulations I have left out fractions. Sometimes the fraction would be on the one side and sometimes on the other. I have adopted the nearest round number.

Who voted against this Roosevelt amendment in the House? Republicans so voting numbered 30, led by JULIUS KAHN, who was committed to the draft theory, and who led the fight in the House when, in the first instance, this amendment was voted down; but in this last battle on the conference report KAHN was able to rally only 30 Republicans to his support.

On the vote to recommit and to accept the Roosevelt amendment the Democrats voting against it were 148, Republicans 30. What was the per cent? The per cent voting against it was Republicans 17 per cent, Democrats 83 per cent.

One other thing. Take the entire Republican vote cast in the House at that time on the yeas and nays, and how did it stand? Yeas 171, nays 30, total Republican vote being 201. The per cent of the total Republican vote against the Roosevelt amendment was 14 per cent.

The entire Democratic vote cast on that amendment was 192—yeas 44, nays 148. The per cent against the Roosevelt amendment was 77. That looks to me very much as if it was made a partisan question in the House of Representatives.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. STONE. I yield.

Mr. CALDER. I would like to ask the Senator if he knows that when the Roosevelt amendment was voted down it was voted down by tellers; there was no roll call; but when there was a record vote it carried by the majority he refers to.

Mr. STONE. What is the significance of that? That men voting by tellers for or against voted their real convictions, but were afraid to record themselves, and so changed on a record vote?

Mr. CALDER. If the Senator's inquiry is directed to me, I would say it was the change of sentiment in the country for Mr. Roosevelt. It was caused by the fact that the Members of the House believed the people throughout the United States wished Mr. Roosevelt to go.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I pass that by. If we are to have volunteers, why limit the volunteer units to divisions? That is the question I am interested in. It is the provision in the bill which limits it to a division that I am now particularly objecting to. Why not let other men equally able and patriotic, equally anxious to raise not divisions perhaps, but regiments and brigades, have the right to do so?

If this obnoxious amendment could be so broadened as to extend the privilege of performing this service to other men as well as to Col. Roosevelt, and authorize them to raise regiments or brigades, the forces so organized could be combined into larger units under the command of experienced officers, and they would get to the front at least as quickly as the much-exploited Roosevelt contingent, and could get to the front in better form and under better auspices for effective service.

Mr. President, there are Senators—indeed, the very Senators proposing this Roosevelt amendment—who cry out, as I have already said, "We must have no politics in this war." I agree to that sentiment absolutely; I insist upon its strict observance; and I want every Senator to stick squarely to it. It is worse than useless, however, for Senators to declaim against politics in the war while at the same time they are proposing a scheme which is saturated with the very slime of politics.

III.

I have said that Mr. Roosevelt has no respect for authority and that he is incapable of subordination or obedience. His whole career demonstrates the justness of that indictment. It would be the height of unwisdom, indeed it would be dangerous, to confer an important command in a great army upon a man of his temperament. I know that more lately he has declared that all he asks is authority to raise a division, and that after he has raised it he would be willing to accept a subordinate command, say, of a brigade of that division; but it would be "Roosevelt's division," and you know as well as I know that he would practically and in effect command it or have a row.

As President he was for more than seven years Commander in Chief of the Army, and no President was ever more dogmatic and dictatorial in the exercise of his authority. Every Senator who served here at that time knows that statement to be true.

He summoned old war-worn and battle-scarred veterans, like Gen. Miles, more than once altogether to stand before him with their toes on the chalk line. Kaiser Wilhelm himself was never more autocratic in a military sense than was President Roosevelt. Talk of authorizing him to raise a division to be distinguished by the name of the "Roosevelt division"—distinguished in that way, written in that way, given out in that way—the "Roosevelt division," and then talk of him taking a subordinate command of that division under some general who had been subject to him for seven and a half years! Do you believe it possible that this man could submit obediently to such authority? Unless he has undergone a marvelous change—and we have no evidence of that—he would not be in France six weeks before he would have the command—the division—in some sort of a ferment. The Army would constantly be bedeviled with round robins, or some other kind of robins, from the very start. We would have his part of the campaign in Cuba reproduced on an aggravated scale.

Why, Mr. President, his very persistence—I want to press this upon your thought—his very persistence in this matter, his individual persistence in this matter, is proof of his trouble-making insubordination. The President of the United States, the Secretary of War, and the military authorities of the Government have united on a plan of a selective draft to raise this great emergency army, and in that view the two Houses of Congress have concurred by an overwhelmingly vote. The President and the Congress have concurred as to that. Numerous Senators and Members of the other House did not approve of the conscriptive plan, but favored the raising of the Army through the agency of volunteers. The great majority, however, took the other view. After both the executive and legislative departments of the Government adopted the selective-draft system with practical unanimity, everybody accepted it as the plan agreed upon and to be carried out, except Roosevelt, and possibly those who may be regarded as his personal partisans. He still persists, and all along has persisted, in clamoring for what? The personal privilege of raising volunteers; and that has been put by him and his partisans upon the ground that he of all others could do that and that he personally wanted to do it. He is the one man in the whole country who will not accept what has been agreed upon, and who refuses to yield to the expressed judgment of the Government and the country. He persists, in spite of the general judgment, in touring the land and employing all the arts of which he is capable to compel the Government to confer this special honor and privilege upon him, to the exclusion of everybody else, and it is so stated on the floor here by Senators who have advocated it. By this course, while professing to approve the selective-draft system—and he does profess to do that—he defiantly—now think of that—defiantly antagonizes the underlying principle of the selective-draft system. While persisting in this course it is no answer for his partisan advocates here to say that in a general way he approves of the selective-draft system. To assume that attitude is the equivalent of saying—now, Senators, is this not true?—that he favors the application of the selective-draft system to everybody but Theodore Roosevelt. He seems to proceed on the theory that he should be exempt from the rules which he says are right rules for the government of the balance of the country. That position is essentially Rooseveltian.

Roosevelt has never stood by or harmoniously cooperated with any organization with which he has ever been connected—civil, political, or military—unless he could dominate it. Every Senator here knows that to be essentially true. The whole country knows it to be true. The history of all this is of too recent date, too fresh in the memories of men, for anyone to question it.

The Senator from Massachusetts said in his speech supporting this amendment that the ex-President, Mr. Roosevelt, would be a strong and inspiring figure in France; that he would be on easy, intimate, influential terms with the President of France and with other important officials in France, and so on and so forth. That is the substance of the Senator's utterance, although not the exact language. If President Wilson thinks he needs Mr. Roosevelt for any purpose of that kind, let the President send him to France for that sort of service in a civil capacity. If the President wishes him for that, let him choose him for it. Mr. Wilson is supposed to be in command; not Roosevelt. I express the opinion that the President of France does not need Mr. Roosevelt's services as a military censor or advisor. I venture to indulge that doubt. The President of France, speaking through Marshal Joffre, says that he wants American soldiers in France under the command of able and experienced officers at the front. He does not need American politicians, but American soldiers, under the guiding hand of officers who know how to command, and who, therefore, know how to obey when obedience is necessary.

In closing, Mr. President, I can not help regarding this scheme as unworthy of the Senate. It should not have been projected at a time when we are considering a subject of such grave importance as that we have had before us, a subject which concerns the raising of a great and effective American Army to fight our battles, and raising it, too, at an enormous expense to the people. When we are considering a question which so vitally concerns the lives and fortunes of millions of men, we should steer clear of partisan politics, whether present or future politics, and of personal favoritism.

Mr. President, it is possible that out of the storm of this war some great figure will emerge—some great figure like Grant, who rose out of the storm of the Civil War—who will so fascinate the patriotic imagination of the American people as to make him a future President of the United States; but for the honor and good repute of our beloved country let us not now go into the unworthy business of manufacturing presidential candidates. Let us really and honestly keep this frightfully, desperately grave business upon which we are engaged wholly outside the domain of partisan politics.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, in line with what the Senator has just said, I want to read a telegram, or a part of a telegram, under date of May 10:

> I have 1,200 young men who want to form an Artillery regiment. Have two West Pointers and 20 Regular Army or militia officers for regimental and battery officers. State adjutant general seems to have no authority to accept same. Can you not intercede for us and save this fine organization?

This is signed by a very responsible and, indeed, a wealthy young man in my city. It is one of many similar offers that have been made.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. I beg that the Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE] will not leave for a moment.

The amendment, Mr. President, in this particular instance was offered by the distinguished Senator from Ohio [Mr. HARDING] and was supported by the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE]. I regret exceedingly that any response should be made by me to what has just been stated by the distinguished and eloquent Senator from Missouri, but I feel, Mr. President, that I would be wanting in the affection that I have for Theodore Roosevelt if I did not at least register a dissent and answer in a feeble way that which has been said upon this floor to-day. In answering, I answer not in bitterness of spirit at all, and I do not answer in crimination or recrimination in any degree. I answer the distinguished Senator from Missouri because I am the friend of Theodore Roosevelt, and in the territory from which I come when a friend is assailed, it is the duty of his friend, even inadequately, feebly, and weakly, but to the best of his ability, at least to respond.

I listened with surprise; with chagrin—aye, as a Senator of the United States, the youngest in service upon this floor, I listened with humiliation—to the remarks of the senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE] as he excoriated Theodore Roosevelt, and as he held up to the scorn and the contumely of this Nation what he termed contemptuously "the Roosevelt division." With every variety of inflection that it was possible for him to infuse into the words, again and again he spoke of "the Roosevelt division" under this amendment. Had the words come from any other than a Senator of the United States; had the words been uttered in that fashion outside of this particular assemblage; had we heard this sort of thing said by one beyond the portals of this Capitol concerning the Roosevelt division, we would have concluded at once that the utterer desired no division at all of American soldiers in this war. That, of course, would not be imputed to any Senator upon this floor. But I glory, Mr. President, in the Roosevelt division; and notwithstanding the contempt voiced concerning that division, it is with pleasure and with joy and with a bubbling patriotism that I refer to "the Roosevelt division," as the Senator has termed it.

Oh, the Roosevelt division! What is it that is asked? It is asked only by a man who is now really in the twilight of life that he may finally lay down his life for the country that has been his. It is only that he asks that he may serve that country, may go forth to battle for his country's rights, and may do all that may be done by human being in behalf of his Nation. When was it that a nation denied to its sons the right to fight in its behalf? I may be acquitted of the criticism that has been leveled to-day at certain Senators who voted for this amendment alone, because I voted as well to permit volunteers; but the attack that has been made in this Chamber is one that I regret, and it is a very, very sad thing at this particular time.

We have stood shoulder to shoulder, both sides of this Chamber, in this war. I vie with you, sir, and with every man upon the other side, in upholding what may be necessary to be done in this time of national crisis. Every man here, no matter what his previous political predilections have been, has stood for the right, for Americanism, and for our flag in this great contest. It has remained for to-day in the United States Senate, for the first time in the history of this conflict, and the first occasion since the 2d day of April last, when the President made his glorious address to the Houses of Congress, for politics to be injected into this particular fray and into this world conflict. There is no politics in begging to serve one's country; the politics is in the carping and ungenerous criticism of the request.

To say that Roosevelt desires for personal ambition and political favor hereafter to go to war is indeed to beg the entire question and to deny the entire life of this patriot. To say that he has asked in this particular instance that he may enlist in behalf of his Nation for political reasons is, I submit, without either foundation in fact or foundation, indeed, in any logical deduction that may be drawn from the events of the last few years.

The distinguished Senator has said that Roosevelt has toured the land in the endeavor to do that which he desires. Aye, he has toured the land. He toured the land for preparedness two and a half years ago, and ye laughed at him as hysterical. He toured the land two and a half years ago, and continuously since, for undiluted Americanism, and ye said that he was merely dealing in jingoism. To-day you have adopted his doctrine of preparedness. To-day his undiluted Americanism, to which at first but few listened, has become the slogan of the whole Nation. He toured the land for patriotism, for Americanism, and patriotism and Americanism constitute his offense.

Oh, this attack is a sad, sad thing! This war is no man's war; as has been repeatedly said upon the floor of this Chamber, it is no party's war; and it is a war, no matter what may be the internecine strife against those who wish to fight the war that will be fought and will be fought for the American Nation.

I yield, of course, a ready obedience and obeisance to the extraordinary military knowledge of the distinguished Senator from Missouri. I recognize him as a military strategist who, in a few brief sentences on the floor of this Chamber, can dispose of the services of a man like Theodore Roosevelt, given in time of stress in the nineties, as he gives those services in time of stress like the present. I recall that charge up the hill about which the distinguished Senator sneers this afternoon, and which he has belittled, and which, indeed, he has ridiculed. After all, my friends, Roosevelt fought, and he fought for the United States of America. After all, he asks only that he be permitted to fight to-day for the United States of America; and in that charge up San Juan Hill, take the contemporaneous records and you will find that he fought the fight of a brave man that day, and that he led his command, and that he led them to victory.

Experience is spoken of, the necessity for a military education, and the like. Grant it if you will. There is one thing this man has, one thing that he has proven in the life that he has lived in the open in this Nation: He has red blood in his veins, and he has the ability to fight, and he has the tenacity and the courage to win when he fights; and that is the sort of an American that is needed and is required in this war. I say to you, gentlemen of this particular assemblage, that if a man can raise a division, if he is able to go forward, if he wishes to fight, to die if need be, for his country, it is a sad and it is a humiliating thing that his motives shall be questioned and that his course shall be assailed in the very act near the close of his great career, which is the noblest and greatest of all.

Oh, for more Roosevelts in this Nation! Oh, for more men who will stand upon the hustings and go about the country preaching the undiluted Americanism that all of us claim to have! Oh, for more Roosevelts and more divisions of men who will follow Roosevelt! With more Roosevelts and more Roosevelt divisions the flag of the United States will go forth in this great world conflict to the victory that every real American should desire and demand.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I send to the desk and ask to have read as a part of my remarks a clipping from to-day's Washington Times, which I think somewhat apropos to the situation.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection? The Chair hears none, and the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

NOW FOR ACTION.

A good Quaker once encouraged an assailant who was indulging in billingsgate with the remark, "That's right, friend; let the bad stuff out of thee."

The Senate, having spent some four hours yesterday in executive session in letting off the accumulated volume of criticism against the newspapers for hurrying them up, against the people who do not understand the importance of preserving senatorial dignity at all hazards, at the administration for its manifest desire to see the war measures passed, and the Council of National Defense for exceeding its powers, should now be able to get down to business. The mountain duly labored and produced a diminutive mouse, in the form of an amendment requiring the Council of National Defense to obey the laws.

But, seriously, this is no time for insisting on senatorial prerogatives. It is true that the Senate feels that the creator is above any of its creatures, and as it helps to pass legislation making new offices and then has its say concerning the men to fill these offices it feels that no man selected for an important task can possibly know more than a Senator. It feels the contempt of the creator for the creature whenever it indulges in criticism of "some little bureau chief." The big business men, on the other hand, who have patriotically proffered their services to the Government and form the Council of National Defense and its advisory boards and working committees are naturally impatient at being hampered by restrictions which the Senate thinks are necessary to safeguard its own powers. They wonder that it takes days of debate to decide questions on which any educated man, not having his constituents in mind, could express his opinion in five minutes, which an ordinary board of directors could pass upon in a half hour. There must be patience here on both sides. The Senate has heard from the press and from the people that needless delay will not be tolerated, and it will yet find a way to suppress the senatorial proclivity of talking ad libitum. The executive session is not a bad idea in itself, for while its proceedings are always duly reported in the newspapers, the speeches made can not be sent out to one's constituents, and talking for buncombe is largely eliminated.

It is a great task on which the United States has entered, one in which useless delay is hampering and may be fatal. The signs that the Senate begins to appreciate this fact in attempting to defend its habits of procrastination are welcome to the American people.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I have nothing to add to that, except to express the hope that in some way, somehow, we may speed up and attend to the people's business.

In so far as the discussion about the obtrusion of politics into the present situation is concerned, I am sorry to say that I agree with both sides. I think that politics has been brought into it on one side in the way of fighting for position, and on the other side in the way of trying to prevent somebody's fighting for position. I think it is a case of mountains laboring and a ridiculous mouse being born; and I do hope, with all the balance of the one hundred and four millions of the American people, that we will stop useless differences among ourselves, and will try to bring the emergent business of the Republic to a speedy conclusion.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I desire to suggest to the Senate that the trouble we have, at least a number of us, growing out of the fact that the conference report has stricken out the language limiting the emergency to the war with Germany, might be obviated by a very brief amendment to the military appropriation bill which we will take up immediately after the conference report, if we adopt the conference report; and for information I wish to read to the Senate an amendment which I shall offer at the close of that bill, numbering it section 4:

That the language "existing emergency" or "emergency" used in the act passed at the present session of Congress entitled "An act to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States" is hereby declared to mean the emergency caused by the war with Germany.

That bill is an appropriation bill for military purposes. I am not sure that this amendment could be offered over objection. We could handle it very easily, however, by temporarily laying aside the conference report—the chairman of the Appropriations Committee has seen this amendment and will accept it—and if we could be allowed to add this amendment to the military bill, I think many of us would vote for the conference report without embarrassment.

I have been impressed with the importance of terminating action upon this conference report, and yet, frankly, I would not have voted for the bill except with the distinct understanding that "the emergency" meant the war with Germany, and I am distressed that those shaping the bill desire to eliminate that language. I believe that a large majority of the Senate meant by that language the war with Germany, and I wish to submit this to the Senate to see if there is any objection to it.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, as I remember the reading of that amendment, it says that it is to be construed to mean the emergency caused by the war with Germany.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes; it limits the emergency to the emergency caused by the war with Germany.

Mr. JONES of Washington. All sorts of things may grow out of the war with Germany.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. No; I do not think that is the case.

Mr. JONES of Washington. They might. I do not think that language will meet the situation at all.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The Senator does not think it goes far enough? Would the Senator agree to this language:

Is hereby declared to mean the war with Germany.

I want to find out if there is any objection on the part of the Senate to adding that language to the House bill.

Mr. PHELAN. I should like to inquire the object of the Senator in limiting the emergency to the war with Germany.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. We have been debating that quite a while. Many of us are utterly unwilling to give these powers except as incidents of the war with Germany, and in voting for the bill we put that language into it and sent it to conference with that language in it.

Mr. PHELAN. In the event of the adjournment of Congress, should another emergency arise—war with another nation—would not the legislation we have passed to meet the emergency cease and be of no avail?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. There could not be a war with another nation unless we came and declared war. I for one am utterly opposed, and we have spoken on that for hours to-day, to giving a selective-draft system except for this specific war.

Mr. PHELAN. Do I understand that the Senator contemplates Congress shall remain in session during the entire period of the war?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I certainly contemplate that Congress should be in session if war is to be declared.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. It would be bound to be in session.

Mr. GALLINGER. And whether war or not, if the Senator will permit me, it looks very much like we might be in session for the rest of the year.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair hears no objection to the amendment, and assumes no point of order will be raised against the amendment as presented by the Senator from Georgia. The question now recurs on agreeing to the conference report.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I desire a little light if I can get it. The Senator from Georgia proposed to withdraw objection to the pending conference report upon some kind of an assurance, a sort of a good-faith assurance here, that no point of order would be raised against an amendment which he has written out and read to us. That is all right so far as it goes, and, of course, if that method is pursued, I do not object, but I confess that as a Member of the Senate I should like to know a little more of the reasons which caused the chairman of the committee to suggest that it is not safe to send the bill back to conference. It went to conference; the House withdrew it from the first conference, reversed its own action, and sent it back. I think the third conference report has been printed. In all these cases the additional conference has been at the request of the House.

I wish the chairman of the committee could take us into his confidence and tell us why it is dangerous to send the bill back.

I confess that I am getting awfully tired of being told that I must do something because some mysterious agency is at work or some mysterious danger is impending or some mysterious thing is going to happen. I think we ought to know. It is inconceivable to me that the House of Representatives would deliberately undertake to forestall and destroy this legislation. It may be that the House of Representatives may desire to submit some other matter. It certainly would be very extraordinary if that body at this late day would ask to reopen the entire question.

I do not fear another Roosevelt amendment, because there is only one Roosevelt. It is barely possible that they might want to open the plan of volunteering to the entire country. But whatever the reasons are I think we are entitled to be given them. Then I am in favor of taking such action with reference to the particular bill that is now before us as we think we ought to take, and let the chances follow.

I ask the chairman of the committee if he can not give us some further light.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I think the Senator from Missouri is in just as good a position as I am to know the objections that are likely to arise if this bill comes up again in another conference, to be considered possibly by new conferees. As a matter of fact, I do not know how far I am permitted to speak of the feeling of the conferees. The House conferees are all splendid and able gentlemen, but there was the Democratic chairman of the Military Affairs Committee on that conference who was originally entirely opposed to the draft principle. It is true when the House declared a policy he followed it out, and he was criticized on the floor of the House because he stood for the House action in excluding the so-called Roosevelt amendment in the first conference. On the other hand, the ranking Republican member of the committee in the conference was in favor of the draft system. The other members of the conference on the part of the House were divided in opinion as to the matter, so it can be seen that our work was not all plain sailing in conference. This diversity of opinion exists in the House.

I call the Senator's attention to one thing that may come up again in conference. It was very bitterly fought out in conference. That is the question of regulating vice and the use of intoxicating liquors in military reservations and camps. All these matters are now a part of the bill and would inevitably come up again. The Senator has no idea of the difficulties we encountered in trying to reach an agreement on this very important measure.

The Senator says that the conference would hardly go back on the action of their respective bodies, yet we find that the Senate itself, after it solemnly passed the so-called Roosevelt amendment, undertakes to reverse the action of the Senate now on the report of the committee. May not the House reverse itself on important provisions of the bill again as it did on the volunteer amendment?

Mr. WILLIAMS. There was not a thing about it in conference.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. There was not any difference on that amendment as it is now reported between the Senate and House. The two bodies were in exact accord as the bill is finally reported here. But there is no assurance that either body will stand hitched, as the Senator from Mississippi suggests, and they may change their policy on every phase of the bill if it is taken up again.

Mr. President, it has been argued here all the time that this measure violates the traditions of this country, and nobody has done it more eloquently or more ably than the Senator from Missouri [Mr REED]. That feeling is still in existence. All these questions will come up again and be discussed over again in the House, and in the Senate, too, so far as that is concerned, and consume weeks of time.

My own opinion is, based upon conversations I have had with Members of the House and with Members of the Senate, too, that if this bill goes back to conference there will be no legislation within the next 30 or 60 or 90 days on this subject, and it is very essential that something be done and done quickly.

I can not help but repeat that the whole War Department is tied up in undertaking to do something with respect to increasing the Military Establishment. It is waiting for Congress to act.

I am not one of those who believe we ought to rush things because the press criticizes or some department insists upon its being done, but, Mr. President, I think every one realizes the importance of this situation and the necessity for getting through this bill to provide for the Army.

In this connection I am going to ask to have printed in the RECORD a statement of the history of this bill and its progress through the two Houses. There has been some suggestion that a good deal of time has been taken in the matter. I simply want to put this statement as to what has been done and how promptly it has been done in the RECORD.

The matter referred to is as follows:

HISTORY OF THE SELECTIVE-DRAFT MEASURE IN CONGRESS.

SENATE PROCEEDINGS.

April 16, 1917: First meeting of the Committee on Military Affairs held to consider the measure. Between April 4 and 16 the Committee on Military Affairs was considering the Army appropriation bill, the Military Academy appropriation, and a bill (S. 1786) to amend the national defense act approved June 3, 1916.

April 17, 1917: Measure again considered by the committee. Certain modifications made in the bill as submitted by the Secretary of War, and it was introduced in the Senate by Senator CHAMBERLAIN and known as Senate bill 1871, a bill to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States.

April 18, 1917: Bill considered by committee, certain amendments made thereto, and it was ordered reported to the Senate as amended.

April 19, 1917: Bill reported to the Senate by Senator CHAMBERLAIN with majority report (S. Rept. No. 22) and bill placed on the Senate Calendar.

April 21, 1917: Motion made in Senate by Senator CHAMBERLAIN to proceed to its consideration, and agreed to. Minority report signed by Senators THOMAS, MCKELLAR, REED, KIRBY, and HITCHCOCK submitted to the Senate same day.

April 22, 23, 24, 25, 26, 27, and 28, 1917: Bill considered by Senate.

April 28, 1917: Bill passed by Senate at midnight. Recess taken for 30 minutes.

April 29, 1917: H. R. 3545, the House selective draft bill, placed before the Senate at 12.30 a. m. and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs. Reported back to the Senate by Senator CHAMBERLAIN, striking out all of the House bill after the enacting clause and substituting the provisions of S. 1871 as the latter bill had passed the Senate and bill placed on the Senate Calendar.

April 30 and May 1, 1917: House bill as amended considered.

May 1, 1917: House bill as amended passed by Senate, Senate on motion insisting on its amendment, asking for a conference with the House, and appointing Senators CHAMBERLAIN, HITCHCOCK, and WARREN conferees on the part of the Senate. Senate bill 1871 was thereupon postponed indefinitely by the Senate, it not having been sent to the House of Representatives after its passage by the Senate.

May 1, 1917: House disagreed to the amendment of the Senate and agreed to the conference asked for by the Senate, and appoints Messrs. DENT, FIELDS, QUIN, KAHN, and ANTHONY the conferees on the part of the House.

May 5, 1917: First meeting of the conference committee of the Senate and House.

The same conferees, between May 1 and 5, held conferences on the Army appropriation bill and the Military Academy appropriation bill, and finally disposed of both appropriation bills.

May 7, 8, 9, and 10, 1917: Conference held on the bill.

May 10, 1917: Conference report made in Senate by Senator CHAMBERLAIN, inserting new language for the matter carried in the bill as it was amended by the Senate. Conference report was signed by all the Senate conferees and the House conferees, except Mr. KAHN and Mr. ANTHONY.

May 11, 1917: Conference report made in the House by Mr. DENT.

May 12, 1917: Conference report considered by House and recommitted to the conferees on motion to instruct the House conferees to agree to a certain provision in the bill as it passed the Senate (the so-called Roosevelt provision). Senator CHAMBERLAIN in the Senate withdrew the conference report he had heretofore submitted to the Senate in view of the action of the House of Representatives.

May 14, 1917: Conference committee met in second conference and inserted the provision in the bill as passed by the Senate relating to the voluntary enlistment of not to exceed four infantry divisions, the so-called Roosevelt provision, being the seventh paragraph of section 1.

May 15, 1917: Conference report (second) made to House and Senate.

May 16, 1917: House recommits the bill to the conference committee the second time with instructions to insert in the bill a provision relating to a graduated increase in the pay of the enlisted men. The second conference report heretofore made in the Senate was thereupon withdrawn by Senator CHAMBERLAIN. The conference committee met for the third conference and inserted in the bill the provision relating to the pay of enlisted men, upon which the House conferees had been instructed. Third conference report made in the House and agreed to.

May 17, 1917: Third conference report made in the Senate.

Mr. President, I feel very deeply on the subject of getting this measure through, because I do not believe we can get it out in any reasonable time if it goes back to conference.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I think all the Members of the Senate appreciate the desirability of getting action. Nobody here will desire to delay the bill. I can not think that the House of Representatives will fail to understand the question in just the same way and be actuated by just as patriotic motives. There has been only one suggestion made by the Senator that it seems to me could possibly open up any prolonged discussion, and that is that the draft proposition is proving unsatisfactory, for I think that is a fair interpretation of the Senator's language, although that is not his language.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I did not mean to say that.

Mr. REED. Of course, if there is such a revolt in the country as will compel the Representatives in Congress to reverse themselves upon that proposition, if there is any such feeling as that in the country, we ought to heed it now, because I say to the chairman of the committee, whom I greatly admire and whose earnest work I appreciate and value, and I say to everyone this war must be carried on by the American people, and whoever expects to carry it to a successful termination would do well to have great regard for the opinion of the American people in the matter of its conduct.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. May I interrupt the Senator for just a moment?

Mr. REED. Certainly.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I did not want the Senator to gather from what I had to say that I thought the selective draft was becoming unpopular. On the contrary, I believe the communications I have received contradict that idea. I did not mean to have that understood by the Senator.

Mr. REED. I do not want to state the case so that the Senator will be put in a light he does not desire to be put in. My own notion about it is just as I have heretofore expressed it. But I had my day in court here; I was defeated, and I am not trying to hold the bill up so as to get another vote. If the only thing that is left is the matter of cutting out the language that has been referred to by the Senator from Georgia in his recent remarks, I do not desire to delay final action, although I say to the Senate now that unless it does adopt a resolution construing the bill, it is my opinion that it is the fixed purpose of the War Department to give to the bill an entirely different meaning from that which was intended by Congress. I have not the slightest doubt of it.

I say again, and I want to say it with all respect in the world, but I say it because I think it is my solemn duty as one Member of this body, with all respect in the world for our Military Establishment, without saying that it may not be the best of its size in the world, I yet say that Congress has certain functions to perform. It must represent the American people. I never yet knew a professional military man who understood public opinion or understood how to deal with the civilian population. I think we ought not to tolerate any further interference with the language of bills as written by Congress, and that this language was changed in this bill, directly or indirectly, at the demand of the Military Establishment I can not possibly entertain any doubt.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President, I should like to say just a few words with a view of acquitting myself of any responsibility for delay upon this measure.

With all respect to the opinions which have been expressed by Senators here to-day in discussing the difference between the language of the bill and the language employed by the Senate, or the difference between the "existing emergency" and "during the present war with Germany," it seems to me to be the difference between tweedledee and tweedledum.

While I have been entirely willing to agree to the amendment that was suggested a few moments ago by the senior Senator from Georgia, saying that we mean by the existing emergency the present war with Germany, I think it is wholly unnecessary. Is there an intelligent child over 12 years in the United States that does not know that the existing emergency is the war with Germany? We are confronted with no other emergency, Mr. President, but the emergency that arises out of the war with Germany.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President——

Mr. KNOX. Just let me finish this sentence. The language of this conference report is that those who are drafted shall be required to serve for the period of the existing emergency unless sooner discharged, not an emergency, as was suggested this morning, that might arise with some other country later on during the prosecution and conduct of the war, arising with some country, as was suggested, on our own hemisphere. That would not be the existing emergency referred to in this bill. This bill from its title to its conclusion refers not to emergencies generally, not to an emergency which may arise later on, but to the existing emergency.

I repeat, Mr. President, I doubt if anyone has any other conception as to what the existing emergency is than that it is the emergency of the German war.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. KNOX. I have finished.

Mr. WADSWORTH. May I say, supplementing the remarks of the Senator from Pennsylvania, that it is very easy, to my mind, to think of an existing emergency which may not be terminated with the end of this war. It all depends upon the terms of the treaty of peace when the war shall have ended. The terms of the treaty of peace may not end the emergency. It has happened, I think, at least once in the history of this country that the treaty of peace was not deemed as the ending of the emergency. I think when the War of the Revolution came to a close and the treaty of peace was signed one of the terms of the treaty was that British troops were to be quartered or allowed to be stationed in portions of the then United States until certain other terms of the treaty were fulfilled, and until those troops were withdrawn the emergency of the people of the United States did not cease.

So at the end of the Franco-Prussian War, which, as everyone knows, resulted in the victory of Prussia, one of the terms of the treaty of peace there was that German or Prussian troops should be quartered upon the French people until the indemnity was paid, and so long as German troops were quartered upon French soil the emergency confronting the French people continued to exist. No man dares to prophesy what the terms of the treaty which shall bring this war to a close may be. It may very well be that the signing of the treaty of peace between the United States and its allies upon one side and the Teutonic powers upon the other will not definitely and conclusively end the emergency. It may be necessary for us, in compliance with the very terms of the treaty of peace, to keep this army in being for six months or one year after peace shall have been concluded.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland (when his name was called). My general pair, the Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM], is absent; but I understand that if present he would vote as I shall vote. Therefore I vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. VARDAMAN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Idaho [Mr. BRADY]. In his absence I withhold my vote. If I were permitted to vote, I should vote "nay."

While I am on my feet I desire to announce the absence of the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] on official business.

Mr. WEEKS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES]. I understand that if present he would vote on this proposition as I intend to vote. I therefore vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. WOLCOTT (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON] to the senior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. HUGHES] and vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. GERRY (after having voted in the affirmative). I have a general pair with the Senator from New York [Mr. CALDER]. I am informed that that Senator is absent on an important engagement. I also understand that if present he would vote "yea." I will therefore let my vote stand.

Mr. CURTIS. I desire to announce the absence of the junior Senator from Ohio [Mr. HARDING] on account of illness. I am advised that if he were present he would vote "yea."

Mr. FALL. I was not present in the Chamber when my name was called. For reasons that I gave in the remarks which I to-day delivered on this subject, I request to be excused from voting upon this question.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. FERNALD. I have a pair with the junior Senator from South Dakota [Mr. JOHNSON], but I understand that if present he would vote as I shall vote on this question. I therefore vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. BANKHEAD. My colleague [Mr. UNDERWOOD] is unavoidably absent on official business. If present, he would vote "yea."

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I desire to announce that my colleague, the senior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF], has a general pair with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN]. If present, my colleague would vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 65, nays 8, as follows:

DISPOSITION OF CONFERENCE REPORTS (S. DOC. NO. 33).

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, in connection with the matter we have just been considering, and which we have just disposed of, I wish to say that, with the assistance of Mr. Gilfry, who is the author of our book on precedents, we have collated the precedents that relate to the disposition of conference reports. This matter is in a condensed form, and I should like, if there be no objection, to have this compilation printed in the RECORD as a matter of convenient reference.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. LODGE. I desire to suggest that it may also be printed as a Senate document. I think it would be very convenient in that form.

Mr. SMOOT. That would be very much better.

Mr. STONE. Does the Senator mean to have it printed in that form rather than printed in the RECORD.

Mr. LODGE. No; I suggest that it be printed in both forms.

Mr. SMOOT. Why have it printed in the RECORD?

Mr. STONE. Very well. I ask that it be printed merely as a Senate document.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the order is made.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. MARTIN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After 20 minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, May 17, 1917.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father in Heaven, we thank Thee for every gleam of light which has illumined the mind and cheered the heart of man in his brave and untiring search for truth. Give us new desires and inspire us with greater energy that we may have more light, especially that light that never shone on land or sea, but that makes for righteousness in the soul of man; that sin and iniquity may take wings and fly away, and righteousness, peace, and joy reign supreme in every heart, in the spirit of the Lord Jesus Christ. Amen.

THE JOURNAL.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, I notice that the conference report as printed in the RECORD, and I judge it is the same in the Journal, gives the same pay to the enlisted men, and so on, as the original report of the conference committee in the House. It was changed yesterday to correspond to $15 a month increase for the enlisted men, but it does not appear in the RECORD, and I judge it is the same in the Journal. I want to say that I have examined the original papers, which show that that amendment as adopted by the House, offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD], was correct in the original report, but it is not so printed in the RECORD.

Mr. MANN. Section 10?

Mr. FOSTER. Section 10. Now, if you will observe, the RECORD shows the same old section.

Mr. MANN. I have not examined the RECORD.

Mr. FOSTER. I judge that the gentleman noticed that.

Mr. MANN. I have not examined the RECORD.

Mr. FOSTER. Well, the RECORD shows the same as it was in the first report.

Mr. MANN. I think it ought to be reprinted then.

Mr. FOSTER. I think so.

Mr. MANN. The original conference report is right.

Mr. FOSTER. The original conference report is right, and the corrections as made there were all right. It is not so in the RECORD.

Mr. MANN. How is it in the Journal?

The SPEAKER. The Journal is like the RECORD.

Mr. ROGERS. Is not the report in the RECORD like the one that preceded it?

Mr. FOSTER. If the gentleman will observe the RECORD——

Mr. ROGERS. The statement deals with the Roosevelt amendment on page 2423.

Mr. FOSTER. If you will observe, the RECORD provides——

The SPEAKER. The Chair will call the attention of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER] to a fact that may straighten it out. There were two conference reports made on that bill yesterday.

Mr. FOSTER. I know that, Mr. Speaker, and I am referring to the last one, which provides that enlisted men of the Army of the United States in active service whose pay does not exceed $21 a month shall receive an increase of $10 a month, and so on. Now, the original report shows the $15 per month. That is the amendment that was adopted yesterday.

The SPEAKER. You can not change a bill by changing the RECORD.

Mr. MANN. My colleague states that the conference report is correct.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk reports to the Chair that the original is all right and this is a misprint in the RECORD.

Mr. FOSTER. It ought to be corrected in the RECORD, if that is the case.

Mr. MANN. How is it in the Journal?

The SPEAKER. The same way. The Journal is made up on such matters from the RECORD.

Mr. FOSTER. It ought to be corrected in the Journal so as to correspond.

The SPEAKER. Why, of course.

Mr. FOSTER. So as to correspond with the amendment adopted yesterday by the House.

Mr. MANN. I suggest to my colleague that he ask that the conference report be reprinted in the RECORD correctly and corrected in the Journal.

Mr. FOSTER. I ask that.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER] asks unanimous consent that the report of the conference committee be correctly printed in the RECORD and the correction be made in the Journal. Without objection, it is so ordered. [After a pause.] The Chair hears no objection. That straightens it out.

The Journal was approved.

INCREASE IN THE MILITARY ESTABLISHMENT.

The conference report and statement are as follows:

CONFERENCE REPORT (NO. 53).

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 3545) to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States, having met, after full and further conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment insert the following:

"That in view of the existing emergency, which demands the raising of troops in addition to those now available, the President be, and he is hereby, authorized—

"First. Immediately to raise, organize, officer, and equip all or such number of increments of the Regular Army provided by the national defense act approved June 3, 1916, or such parts thereof as he may deem necessary; to raise all organizations of the Regular Army, including those added by such increments, to the maximum enlisted strength authorized by law. Vacancies in the Regular Army created or caused by the addition of increments as herein authorized which can not be filled by promotion may be filled by temporary appointment for the period of the emergency or until replaced by permanent appointments or by provisional appointments made under the provisions of section 23 of the national defense act, approved June 3, 1916, and hereafter provisional appointments under said section may be terminated whenever it is determined, in the manner prescribed by the President, that the officer has not the suitability and fitness requisite for permanent appointment.

"Second. To draft into the military service of the United States, organize, and officer, in accordance with the provisions of section 111 of said national defense act, so far as the provisions of said section may be applicable and not inconsistent with the terms of this act, any or all members of the National Guard and of the National Guard Reserves, and said members so drafted into the military service of the United States shall serve therein for the period of the existing emergency unless sooner discharged: Provided, That when so drafted the organizations or units of the National Guard shall, so far as practicable, retain the State designations of their respective organizations.

"Third. To raise by draft as herein provided, organize and equip an additional force of 500,000 enlisted men, or such part or parts thereof as he may at any time deem necessary, and to provide the necessary officers, line and staff, for said force and for organizations of the other forces hereby authorized, or by combining organizations of said other forces, by ordering members of the Officers' Reserve Corps to temporary duty in accordance with the provisions of section 38 of the national defense act approved June 3, 1916; by appointment from the Regular Army, the Officers' Reserve Corps, from those duly qualified and registered pursuant to section 23 of the act of Congress approved January 21, 1903 (32 Stats. L., p. 775), from the members of the National Guard drafted into the service of the United States, from those who have been graduated from educational institutions at which military instruction is compulsory, or from those who have had honorable service in the Regular Army, the National Guard, or in the Volunteer forces, or from the country at large; by assigning retired officers of the Regular Army to active duty with such force with their rank on the retired list and the full pay and allowances of their grade; or by the appointment of retired officers and enlisted men, active or retired, of the Regular Army as commissioned officers in such forces: Provided, That the organization of said force shall be the same as that of the corresponding organizations of the Regular Army: Provided further, That the President is authorized to increase or decrease the number of organizations prescribed for the typical brigades, divisions, or army corps of the Regular Army, and to prescribe such new and different organizations and personnel for army corps, divisions, brigades, regiments, battalions, squadrons, companies, troops, and batteries as the efficiency of the service may require: Provided further, That the number of organizations in a regiment shall not be increased nor shall the number of regiments be decreased: Provided further, That the President in his discretion may organize, officer, and equip for each Infantry and Cavalry brigade three machine-gun companies, and for each Infantry and Cavalry division four machine-gun companies, all in addition to the machine-gun companies comprised in organizations included in such brigades and divisions: Provided further, That the President in his discretion may organize for each division one armored motor car machine-gun company. The machine-gun companies organized under this section shall consist of such commissioned and enlisted personnel and be equipped in such manner as the President may prescribe: And provided further, That officers with rank not above that of colonel shall be appointed by the President alone, and officers above that grade by the President by and with the advice and consent of the Senate: Provided further, That the President may in his discretion, recommission in the Coast Guard persons who have heretofore held commissions in the Revenue-Cutter Service or the Coast Guard and have left the service honorably, after ascertaining that they are qualified for service physically, morally, and as to age and military fitness.

"Fourth. The President is further authorized, in his discretion and at such time as he may determine, to raise and begin the training of an additional force of 500,000 men organized, officered, and equipped, as provided for the force first mentioned in the preceding paragraph of this section.

"Fifth. To raise by draft, organize, equip, and officer, as provided in the third paragraph of this section, in addition to and for each of the above forces, such recruit training units as he may deem necessary for the maintenance of such forces at the maximum strength.

"Sixth. To raise, organize, officer, and maintain during the emergency such number of ammunition batteries and battalions, depot batteries and battalions, and such artillery parks, with such numbers and grades of personnel as he may deem necessary. Such organizations shall be officered in the manner provided in the third paragraph of this section, and enlisted men may be assigned to said organizations from any of the forces herein provided for or raised by selective draft as by this act provided.

"Seventh. The President is further authorized to raise and maintain by voluntary enlistment, to organize, and equip, not to exceed four Infantry divisions, the officers of which shall be selected in the manner provided by paragraph 3 of section 1 of this act: Provided, That the organization of said force shall be the same as that of the corresponding organization of the Regular Army: And provided further, That there shall be no enlistments in said force of men under 25 years of age at time of enlisting: And provided further, That no such volunteer force shall be accepted in any unit smaller than a division.

"SEC. 2. That the enlisted men required to raise and maintain the organizations of the Regular Army and to complete and maintain the organizations embodying the members of the National Guard drafted into the service of the United States, at the maximum legal strength as by this act provided, shall be raised by voluntary enlistment, or if and whenever the President decides that they can not effectually be so raised or maintained, then by selective draft; and all other forces hereby authorized, except as provided in the seventh paragraph of section 1, shall be raised and maintained by selective draft exclusively; but this provision shall not prevent the transfer to any force of training cadres from other forces. Such draft as herein provided shall be based upon liability to military service of all male citizens, or male persons not alien enemies who have declared their intention to become citizens, between the ages of 21 and 30 years, both inclusive, and shall take place and be maintained under such regulations as the President may prescribe not inconsistent with the terms of this act. Quotas for the several States, Territories, and the District of Columbia, or subdivisions thereof, shall be determined in proportion to the population thereof, and credit shall be given to any State, Territory, District, or subdivision thereof, for the number of men who were in the military service of the United States as members of the National Guard on April 1, 1917, or who have since said date entered the military service of the United States from any such State, Territory, District, or subdivision, either as members of the Regular Army or the National Guard. All persons drafted into the service of the United States and all officers accepting commissions in the forces herein provided for shall, from the date of said draft or acceptance, be subject to the laws and regulations governing the Regular Army, except as to promotions, so far as such laws and regulations are applicable to persons whose permanent retention in the military service on the active or retired list is not contemplated by existing law, and those drafted shall be required to serve for the period of the existing emergency unless sooner discharged: Provided, That the President is authorized to raise and maintain by voluntary enlistment or draft, as herein provided, special and technical troops as he may deem necessary, and to embody them into organizations and to officer them as provided in the third paragraph of section 1 and section 9 of this act. Organizations of the forces herein provided for, except the Regular Army and the divisions authorized in the seventh paragraph of section 1, shall, as far as the interests of the service permit, be composed of men who come, and of officers who are appointed from, the same State or locality.

"SEC. 3. No bounty shall be paid to induce any person to enlist in the military service of the United States; and no person liable to military service shall hereafter be permitted or allowed to furnish a substitute for such service; nor shall any substitute be received, enlisted, or enrolled in the military service of the United States; and no such person shall be permitted to escape such service or to be discharged therefrom prior to the expiration of his term of service by the payment of money or any other valuable thing whatsoever as consideration for his release from military service or liability thereto.

"SEC. 4. That the Vice President of the United States, the officers, legislative, executive, and judicial, of the United States and of the several States, Territories, and the District of Columbia, regular or duly ordained ministers of religion, students who at the time of the approval of this act are preparing for the ministry in recognized theological or divinity schools, and all persons in the military and naval service of the United States shall be exempt from the selective draft herein prescribed; and nothing in this act contained shall be construed to require or compel any person to serve in any of the forces herein provided for who is found to be a member of any well-recognized religious sect or organization at present organized and existing and whose existing creed or principles forbid its members to participate in war in any form and whose religious convictions are against war or participation therein in accordance with the creed or principles of said religious organizations, but no persons so exempted shall be exempted from service in any capacity that the President shall declare to be noncombatant; and the President is hereby authorized to exclude or discharge from said selective draft and from the draft under the second paragraph of section 1 hereof, or to draft for partial military service only from those liable to draft as in this act provided, persons of the following classes: County and municipal officials; customhouse clerks; persons employed by the United States in the transmission of the mails; artificers and workmen employed in the armories, arsenals, and navy yards of the United States, and such other persons employed in the service of the United States as the President may designate; pilots; mariners actually employed in the sea service of any citizen or merchant within the United States; persons engaged in industries, including agriculture, found to be necessary to the maintenance of the Military Establishment or the effective operation of the military forces or the maintenance of national interest during the emergency; those in a status with respect to persons dependent upon them for support which renders their exclusion or discharge advisable; and those found to be physically or morally deficient. No exemption or exclusion shall continue when a cause therefor no longer exists: Provided, That notwithstanding the exemptions enumerated herein, each State, Territory, and the District of Columbia shall be required to supply its quota in the proportion that its population bears to the total population of the United States.

"The President is hereby authorized, in his discretion, to create and establish throughout the several States and subdivisions thereof and in the Territories and the District of Columbia local boards, and where, in his discretion, practicable and desirable, there shall be credited and established one such local board in each county or similar subdivision in each State, and one for approximately each 30,000 of population in each city of 30,000 population or over, according to the last census taken or estimates furnished by the Bureau of Census of the Department of Commerce. Such boards shall be appointed by the President, and shall consist of three or more members, none of whom shall be connected with the Military Establishment, to be chosen from among the local authorities of such subdivisions or from other citizens residing in the subdivision or area in which the respective boards will have jurisdiction under the rules and regulations prescribed by the President. Such boards shall have power within their respective jurisdictions to hear and determine, subject to review as hereinafter provided, all questions of exemption under this act, and all questions of or claims for including or discharging individuals or classes of individuals from the selective draft, which shall be made under rules and regulations prescribed by the President, except any and every question or claim for including or excluding or discharging persons or classes of persons from the selective draft under the provisions of this act authorizing the President to exclude or discharge from the selective draft 'persons engaged in industries, including agriculture, found to be necessary to the maintenance of the Military Establishment, or the effective operation of the military forces, or the maintenance of national interest during the emergency.'

"The President is hereby authorized to establish additional boards, one in each Federal judicial district of the United States, consisting of such number of citizens, not connected with the Military Establishment, as the President may determine, who shall be appointed by the President. The President is hereby authorized, in his discretion, to establish more than one such board in any Federal judicial district of the United States, or to establish one such board having jurisdiction of an area extending into more than one Federal judicial district.

"Such district boards shall review on appeal and affirm, modify, or reverse any decision of any local board having jurisdiction in the area in which any such district board has jurisdiction under the rules and regulations prescribed by the President. Such district boards shall have exclusive original jurisdiction within their respective areas to hear and determine all questions or claims for including or excluding or discharging persons or classes of persons from the selective draft, under the provisions of this act, not included within the original jurisdiction of such local boards.

"The decisions of such district boards shall be final except that, in accordance with such rules and regulations as the President may prescribe, he may affirm, modify or reverse any such decision.

"Any vacancy in any such local board or district board shall be filled by the President, and any member of any such local board or district board may be removed and another appointed in his place by the President, whenever he considers that the interest of the Nation demands it.

"The President shall make rules and regulations governing the organization and procedure of such local boards and district boards, and providing for and governing appeals from such local boards to such district boards, and reviews of the decisions of any local board by the district board having jurisdiction, and determining and prescribing the several areas in which the respective local boards and district boards shall have jurisdiction, and all other rules and regulations necessary to carry out the terms and provisions of this section, and shall provide for the issuance of certificates of exemption, or partial or limited exemptions, and for a system to exclude and discharge individuals from selective draft.

"SEC. 5. That all male persons between the ages of 21 and 30, both inclusive, shall be subject to registration in accordance with regulations to be prescribed by the President; and upon proclamation by the President or other public notice given by him or by his direction stating the time and place of such registration it shall be the duty of all persons of the designated ages, except officers and enlisted men of the Regular Army, the Navy, and the National Guard and Naval Militia while in the service of the United States, to present themselves for and submit to registration under the provisions of this act; and every such person shall be deemed to have notice of the requirements of this act upon the publication of said proclamation or other notice as aforesaid given by the President or by his direction; and any person who shall willfully fail or refuse to present himself for registration or to submit thereto as herein provided, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor and shall, upon conviction in the district court of the United States having jurisdiction thereof, be punished by imprisonment for not more than one year, and shall thereupon be duly registered: Provided, That in the call of the docket precedence shall be given, in courts trying the same, to the trial of criminal proceedings under this act: Provided further, That persons shall be subject to registration as herein provided who shall have attained their twenty-first birthday and who shall not have attained their thirty-first birthday on or before the day set for the registration, and all persons so registered shall be and remain subject to draft into the forces hereby authorized, unless exempted or excused therefrom as in this act provided: Provided further, That in the case of temporary absence from actual place of legal residence of any person liable to registration as provided herein such registration may be made by mail under regulations to be prescribed by the President.

"SEC. 6. That the President is hereby authorized to utilize the service of any or all departments and any or all officers or agents of the United States and of the several States, Territories, and the District of Columbia, and subdivisions thereof, in the execution of this act, and all officers and agents of the United States and of the several States, Territories, and subdivisions thereof, and of the District of Columbia, and all persons designated or appointed under regulations prescribed by the President whether such appointments are made by the President himself or by the governor or other officer of any State or Territory to perform any duty in the execution of this act, are hereby required to perform such duty as the President shall order or direct, and all such officers and agents and persons so designated or appointed shall hereby have full authority for all acts done by them in the execution of this act by the direction of the President. Correspondence in the execution of this act may be carried in penalty envelopes bearing the frank of the War Department. Any person charged as herein provided with the duty of carrying into effect any of the provisions of this act or the regulations made or directions given thereunder who shall fail or neglect to perform such duty; and any person charged with such duty or having and exercising any authority under said act, regulations, or directions, who shall knowingly make or be a party to the making of any false or incorrect registration, physical examination, exemption, enlistment, enrollment, or muster; and any person who shall make or be a party to the making of any false statement or certificate as to the fitness or liability of himself or any other person for service under the provisions of this act, or regulations made by the President thereunder, or otherwise evades or aids another to evade the requirements of this act or of said regulations, or who, in any manner, shall fail or neglect fully to perform any duty required of him in the execution of this act, shall, if not subject to military law, be guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction in the district court of the United States having jurisdiction thereof, be punished by imprisonment for not more than one year, or, if subject to military law, shall be tried by court-martial and suffer such punishment as a court-martial may direct.

"SEC. 7. That the qualifications and conditions for voluntary enlistment as herein provided shall be the same as those prescribed by existing law for enlistments in the Regular Army, except that recruits must be between the ages of 18 and 40 years, both inclusive, at the time of their enlistment; and such enlistments shall be for the period of the emergency unless sooner discharged. All enlistments, including those in the Regular Army Reserve, which are in force on the date of the approval of this act and which would terminate during the emergency shall continue in force during the emergency unless sooner discharged; but nothing herein contained shall be construed to shorten the period of any existing enlistment: Provided, That all persons enlisted or drafted under any of the provisions of this act shall as far as practicable be grouped into units by States and the political subdivisions of the same: Provided further, That all persons who have enlisted since April 1, 1917, either in the Regular Army or in the National Guard, and all persons who have enlisted in the National Guard since June 3, 1916, upon their application, shall be discharged upon the termination of the existing emergency.

"The President may provide for the discharge of any or all enlisted men whose status with respect to dependents renders such discharge advisable; and he may also authorize the employment on any active duty of retired enlisted men of the Regular Army, either with their rank on the retired list or in higher enlisted grades, and such retired enlisted men shall receive the full pay and allowances of the grades in which they are actively employed.

"SEC. 8. That the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, is authorized to appoint for the period of the existing emergency such general officers of appropriate grades as may be necessary for duty with brigades, divisions, and higher units in which the forces provided for herein may be organized by the President, and general officers of appropriate grade for the several Coast Artillery districts. In so far as such appointments may be made from any of the forces herein provided for, the appointees may be selected irrespective of the grades held by them in such forces. Vacancies in all grades in the Regular Army resulting from the appointment of officers thereof to higher grades in the forces other than the Regular Army herein provided for shall be filled by temporary promotions and appointments in the manner prescribed for filling temporary vacancies by section 114 of the national defense act approved June 3, 1916; and officers appointed under the provisions of this act to higher grades in the forces other than the Regular Army herein provided for shall not vacate their permanent commissions nor be prejudiced in their relative or lineal standing in the Regular Army.

"SEC. 9. That the appointments authorized and made as provided by the second, third, fourth, fifth, sixth, and seventh paragraphs of section 1 and by section 8 of this act, and the temporary appointments in the Regular Army authorized by the first paragraph of section 1 of this act, shall be for the period of the emergency, unless sooner terminated by discharge or otherwise. The President is hereby authorized to discharge any officer from the office held by him under such appointment for any cause which, in the judgment of the President, would promote the public service; and the general commanding any division and higher tactical organization or territorial department is authorized to appoint from time to time military boards of not less than three nor more than five officers of the forces herein provided for to examine into and report upon the capacity, qualification, conduct, and efficiency of any commissioned officer within his command other than officers of the Regular Army holding permanent or provisional commissions therein. Each member of such board shall be superior in rank to the officer whose qualifications are to be inquired into, and if the report of such board be adverse to the continuance of any such officer and be approved by the President, such officer shall be discharged from the service at the discretion of the President with one month's pay and allowances.

"SEC. 10. That all officers and enlisted men of the forces herein provided for other than the Regular Army shall be in all respects on the same footing as to pay, allowances, and pensions as officers and enlisted men of corresponding grades and length of service in the Regular Army; and commencing June 1, 1917, and continuing until the termination of the emergency, all enlisted men of the Army of the United States in active service whose base pay does not exceed $21 per month shall receive an increase of $15 per month; those whose base pay is $24, an increase of $12 per month; those whose base pay is $30, $36, or $40, an increase of $8 per month; and those whose base pay is $45 or more, an increase of $6 per month: Provided, That the increases of pay herein authorized shall not enter into the computation of continuous-service pay.

"SEC. 11. That all existing restrictions upon the detail, detachment, and employment of officers and enlisted men of the Regular Army are hereby suspended for the period of the present emergency.

"SEC. 12. That the President of the United States, as Commander in Chief of the Army, is authorized to make such regulations governing the prohibition of alcoholic liquors in or near military camps and to the officers and enlisted men of the Army as he may from time to time deem necessary or advisable: Provided, That no person, corporation, partnership, or association shall sell, supply, or have in his or its possession any intoxicating or spirituous liquors at any military station, cantonment, camp, fort, post, officers' or enlisted men's club, which is being used at the time for military purposes under this act, but the Secretary of War may make regulations permitting the sale and use of intoxicating liquors for medicinal purposes. It shall be unlawful to sell any intoxicating liquor, including beer, ale, or wine, to any officer or member of the military forces while in uniform, except as herein provided. Any person, corporation, partnership, or association violating the provisions of this section or the regulations made thereunder shall, unless otherwise punishable under the Articles of War, be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and be punished by a fine of not more than $1,000 or imprisonment for not more than 12 months, or both.

"SEC. 13. That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized, empowered, and directed during the present war to do everything by him deemed necessary to suppress and prevent the keeping or setting up of houses of ill fame, brothels, or bawdy houses within such distance as he may deem needful of any military camp, station, fort, post, cantonment, training, or mobilization place, and any person, corporation, partnership, or association receiving or permitting to be received for immoral purposes any person into any place, structure, or building used for the purpose of lewdness, assignation, or prostitution within such distance of said places as may be designated, or shall permit any such person to remain for immoral purposes in any such place, structure, or building as aforesaid, or who shall violate any order, rule, or regulation issued to carry out the object and purpose of this section shall, unless otherwise punishable under the Articles of War, be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and be punished by a fine of not more than $1,000, or imprisonment for not more than 12 months, or both.

"SEC. 14. That all laws and parts of laws in conflict with the provisions of this act are hereby suspended during the period of this emergency."

And the Senate agree to the same.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. HUSTED. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a preamble and resolution adopted by the executive committee of the Westchester County Commission of General Safety, held Monday, May 7, 1917.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting certain matter concerning the Senior Service Corps, at my home town, New Haven, Conn.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

INCREASE OF NAVAL ESTABLISHMENT.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table House bill 3330, with Senate amendments, disagree to all the Senate amendments, and agree to the conference asked by the Senate. It is the bill to increase temporarily the enlisted personnel in the Navy.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read the title of the bill, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 3330) to temporarily increase the enlisted and warrant and enlisted strength of the Navy and Marine Corps, and for other purposes.

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker—and I do not intend to object—I believe there is one Senate amendment that undertakes to allow Members of Congress to join the Navy.

Mr. PADGETT. Yes; and fixing the age at 60 years. [Laughter.]

Mr. MANN. Of course, a Member of Congress can not join the Navy without severing his relations with Congress. I have no objection to the provision that Members of the present Congress who resign may join the Navy up to 100 years of age, so far as I am concerned, but I do not desire to amend the Constitution in this way or attempt to amend it at the suggestion of the Senate. Probably there was no one in the Senate who knew that there was a constitutional prohibition against it.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, may I ask the gentleman from Tennessee if this bill undertakes to permit Members of Congress to serve in the Navy and still serve as Members of Congress?

Mr. PADGETT. That is the purpose of the amendment.

Mr. GARNER. Does the gentleman from Tennessee undertake to put that kind of a provision into the law?

Mr. MANN. We are calling attention to it so that we will not.

Mr. PADGETT. The "gentleman from Tennessee" is not the author of that, and he had not conceived it until he saw it in the papers.

Mr. GARNER. There is a constitutional provision against it, and I understand the House still has some reverence for the Constitution.

Mr. RAGSDALE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes.

Mr. RAGSDALE. If a Member of Congress were also commissioned in the Navy, where would his duty be?

Mr. PADGETT. I think he would have to determine that himself.

Mr. RAGSDALE. How could we get a quorum here if the Members were on the ships away from Congress?

Mr. PADGETT. I think his first duty would be in the Senate or in the House. I imagine that a 60-year-old Senator or Member of the House in the enlisted force of the Navy would be about as useful as a blind dog chasing a pig in high rye. [Laughter.]

Mr. MANN. There are various other Senate amendments in the bill?

Mr. PADGETT. Oh, yes; quite a number.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that the bill H. R. 3330, with Senate amendments, be taken from the Speaker's table, that the House disagree to all the Senate amendments, and agree to the conference asked by the Senate. Is there objection?

Mr. GARNER rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. GARNER. To raise an objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will proceed.

Mr. GARNER. I will, with the permission of the Speaker. I want to ask the gentleman from Tennessee this question: What is the object of the gentleman from Tennessee in sending this bill to conference when he realizes that the purpose of this bill is to permit Members of Congress to join the United States Navy?

Mr. PADGETT. Oh, there are quite a lot of other amendments beside that.

Mr. GARNER. Besides this particular one?

Mr. PADGETT. Oh, yes; a number of them.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Chair announces as the conferees on the part of the House Mr. PADGETT, Mr. TALBOTT, and Mr. BUTLER.

VIRGINIA COUNCIL OF DEFENSE.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing some resolutions adopted by the Council of Defense of Virginia.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by inserting the resolutions indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Following are the resolutions referred to:

AN AGRICULTURAL ARMY.

Mr. SEARS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing an editorial published in the Lake Worth Herald of April 29, 1917, on an agricultural army.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Florida asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by inserting the editorial indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Following is the editorial referred to:

AN AGRICULTURAL ARMY.

[From the Lake Worth Herald, Apr. 29, 1917.]

There is considerable talk these days about raising food products. In the big cities the people are being urged to plant every available foot of ground and make of it a little home garden. In some of the cities the parks are being plowed and planted. This sort of thing "listens well," but those who follow such advice will not get back one-tenth of what they spend. It would be just as sensible to advise everybody in the country to turn their attention to cooking. Everybody cook, men, women, and children. A vast amount of food would certainly be wasted. If everybody plants there will be watering cans, hoes, rakes, shovels thrown in the scrap heap before summer is half over, and 75 per cent of the seed will be lost on account of ignorance or carelessness.

If there is extensive planting needed, why doesn't the Government organize an agricultural army? There are thousands of fertile acres in nearly every State in the Union where crops might be raised with profit. Furthermore, there are doubtless thousands of young men who would join an agricultural army, because they would be serving their country and getting some valuable experience. Let the soldiers of this army spend one-half day in the fields working with farm tools and machinery, the balance of the day to be spent drilling and learning the work of a soldier. Certainly such an army would raise an abundance of crops, and every State in the Union would profit, as vast acreages would be subject to the plow.

When a world peace has been declared 65 per cent of these men would adopt agriculture as a vocation, and the great "back-to-the-farm" movement, which really means back to nature, where every man belongs, would get the boost it has been looking for for many years and which must come sooner or later. It would be a credit to Uncle Sam to send 1,000,000 men back from the Army if every man returned with a knowledge of farming and a physique second to none, instead of a thorough knowledge of military drill and no desire to do anything else. Raise an army, but make agriculture a drawing card as a way of serving the country as well as fighting in the ranks.

WAR REVENUE.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 4280, the war-revenue bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 4280) to provide revenue to defray war expenses, and for other purposes, with Mr. FOSTER in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 4280. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read the title of the bill, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 4280) to provide revenue to defray war expenses, and for other purposes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Eleven per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $60,000 and does not exceed $80,000.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend by striking out the word "eleven" and inserting in lieu thereof the figures "13.75."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. LENROOT: Page 3, line 7, strike out the word "eleven" and insert in lieu thereof the figures "13.75."

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask the gentleman just what his purpose is in reference to the balance of the rate contained in this graduated income tax, so that the committee can get an idea of just what other rates he proposes to offer.

Mr. LENROOT. Yes. My purpose is, if this amendment is adopted, to increase each paragraph of the remaining income-tax sections of the bill by 25 per cent. For instance, this paragraph is "11." Increasing it by 25 per cent would make it "13.75." The next is "14," and my amendment would make it "17.50." When we get to 20 per cent that would make it 25.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LENROOT. Yes.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Has the gentleman calculated what additional revenue that would produce?

Mr. LENROOT. Not exactly, because the tables that have been furnished are not in the same classification with the paragraphs in the bill. I will say, however, that I started out with the proposition of beginning with the first paragraph and increasing each one by 25 per cent; that is, in the first item where it is 1 per cent I would would make it 1.25. That would increase it $70,000,000 or $80,000,000 in addition to what is proposed in this bill.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I would make the rough guess that this would raise something like $55,000,000.

Mr. LENROOT. I should say $60,000,000.

Mr. McCORMICK. That is, if you do not go back.

Mr. BARKLEY. Has the gentleman made a computation to see whether this change in the figures will result in any uneven fractions, which will cause extra labor in making the computations at the Treasury Department?

Mr. LENROOT. Not at all. They are just simple decimals—.25, .50, and .75. There is no difficulty about that.

Mr. GARNER. What rate would that make upon incomes of over $500,000?

Mr. LENROOT. With my amendment to this bill it would make the highest rate 41.25 instead of 33, but I think I may say that I have consulted with the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] and I understand that he will offer an amendment further classifying the larger incomes, with a maximum of 50 per cent. And now, unless there is opposition, I do not care to take further time.

Mr. McCORMICK. Ought it not to be explained that the gentleman from Kentucky has amendments reaching incomes up to and including $5,000,000 a year, of which there are quite a number in this country now?

Mr. FORDNEY. Do you mean to say that in this bill the maximum is 50 per cent in addition to existing law, or 50 per cent in all?

Mr. LENROOT. I am stopping with 41.25 per cent, so far as the paragraphs in this bill are concerned. I have stated my understanding of the amendments proposed by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY].

Mr. FORDNEY. Then, under the old law, there is 15 per cent added to that.

Mr. LENROOT. About 64 or 65 per cent is the maximum.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, if we are going to raise more money at this time, under the circumstances which I now know, but of which I was not fully cognizant yesterday, I do not see how I, or the Ways and Means Committee, can oppose the amendment of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT]. I have a statement from the Secretary of the Treasury showing that instead of needing $1,800,000,000, we need $2,245,000,000. According to this statement, the Government needs every dollar that will be raised by the amendment of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] and every dollar that we can possibly raise by this bill without crippling or destroying any industry in this country, or seriously crippling any individual in this country.

Mr. SABATH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. No; please let me finish my statement.

Mr. SABATH. In connection with this thing—I hate to disturb the gentleman——

Mr. KITCHIN. I wish the gentleman would let me proceed for 10 minutes. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] builded better than he knew yesterday, and better than I knew, and better than we knew. According to the statement of the Secretary of the Treasury, we not only need the $60,000,000 increase which his amendment will produce, but we need about $200,000,000 more than his amendment will produce.

Before I sit down I shall ask the Clerk to read a statement from the Treasury Department, received by me yesterday evening. When the Ways and Means Committee submitted this bill to the House we felt that we needed $1,800,000,000. You will recall that when I presented the bill I said that instead of expending for the balance of this fiscal year and all of next fiscal year $3,800,000,000, which the Treasury Department had then estimated, they would come nearer needing $5,000,000,000. Now comes the statement here that we need $2,245,000,000 instead of $1,800,000,000.

Mr. DOWELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. Not now. Let me finish my statement, please, and then I will yield. When we prepared this bill we prepared it with the view of raising $1,800,000,000 by taxation at this time. We concluded that the wiser and better and less burdensome policy was to raise about half of this needed amount from incomes and excess-profits taxes, and the other half from general consumption taxes, and in levying the general consumption taxes that we would first proceed to endeavor to raise all we could from taxes upon luxuries and semiluxuries before we taxed necessities, like freight bills, heat and light bills, increase of postage, and so forth. This bill levies additional taxes upon income and excess profits, amounting to about $840,000,000. In this bill we have increased the income tax $532,700,000, in addition to what we are paying now under the present law; and in addition to the $532,700,000 we are also adding what is called the retroactive tax on incomes of last year to the amount of 33⅓ per cent, which makes in round numbers $640,000,000 additional that we have levied upon incomes in this country. Under this bill we increase the corporation income tax for the next year $165,000,000, and for individual incomes $367,000,000, twice as much as we are now getting from individuals. We now raise under the present law $330,000,000, or will this fiscal year ending June 30, 1917, of which $165,000,000 is from corporations and $165,000,000 from individuals, and we have put on top of that in round numbers $640,000,000. So, under the present law and under the proposed bill the income tax, instead of producing $330,000,000 as under the existing law, will produce $970,000,000. Your committee felt that that was just about as high as we ought to go on incomes to raise this $1,800,000,000.

We further raised $200,000,000 extra on excess profits. It is estimated that the present excess-profits tax will yield $200,000,000 a year. This additional excess-profits tax will make $400,000,000 from excess profits.

Mr. McCORMICK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. McCORMICK. I want to ask the gentleman if he will explain to the committee what consideration was given to the English method of taxing excess profits, and why it was not proposed to the House?

Mr. KITCHIN. When we reach that section I will explain it.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. I do.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. In view of the information from the Treasury Department that $2,245,000,000 will be needed, is it not the thought of the gentleman that we should increase the sum total of this bill from $1,800,000,000 to $2,245,000,000?

Mr. KITCHIN. I do not believe it will be possible for us to do it. It would be a very difficult proposition. We can find out as we go along.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That would make a difference of $445,000,000 that we would have to raise.

Mr. KITCHIN. We are simply making the point that our committee is hardly in a position to oppose this increase of the gentleman from Wisconsin under the circumstances if we are to raise this additional sum at this time.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I ask about these totals, because it will be absolutely necessary to provide new sources of revenue if it is the intent of the chairman to advocate an increase from $1,800,000,000, which is the sum total here provided for. We can not increase to any such sum as $2,245,000,000 without readjusting this entire measure.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, to be candid with the gentleman, I would not attempt to raise at this time the whole extra $400,000,000 in this bill.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Chairman, if I understand the gentleman's position it is this. If the Ways and Means Committee had taken into consideration the additional information coming to the gentleman from the Secretary of the Treasury showing that there is a need of $420,000,000, that committee might have adopted such a method as the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] has suggested.

Mr. KITCHIN. I think if the Secretary of the Treasury had known then that we would absolutely need this increased amount, the Ways and Means Committee would have increased perhaps the income tax and the excess-profits tax and perhaps some other taxes in the bill, and would have searched out somewhere to get some other items by which to raise revenue.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman allow that letter to be read at this time?

Mr. KITCHIN. When I get through.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. HILL. Is there any item in the statement made by the Secretary of the Treasury which, in the opinion of the chairman of this committee, is not absolutely needed for the vigorous prosecution of this war? If there is no such item, why is it not the duty of Congress, if we intend to prosecute the war, to raise the money now?

Mr. KITCHIN. I would say to the gentleman that I would prefer, rather than to attempt to raise it now, to have a little more consideration given to it, to see how best to raise it; and if we could not do that, if we could not find exactly how, then I would say, if it be absolutely necessary, that we should issue some more certificates of indebtedness.

Mr. HILL. The gentleman says he does not propose to oppose this amendment because of the situation. If we are to have further consideration for raising this money, why should not this bill be withdrawn, so that it might be taken up by the committee in a businesslike way, rather than doing it haphazard here upon the floor of the House? I say to the gentleman that I am opposed to the increases that are proposed upon the ground that they will not get us as much money as the bill as drawn will in these very items; and I think I can demonstrate that.

Mr. KITCHIN. I really did not take that view of it, and I had not thought of it in that light. It is possible that some of the rates——

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. LANGLEY. Is the gentleman at liberty to state why the Secretary of the Treasury did not know that this additional amount would be needed at the time the other estimate was made?

Mr. KITCHIN. The Senate, as I understand it, has added several hundred million dollars to the appropriation bill—for instance, $750,000,000 on account of ships.

Mr. LANGLEY. Did not the Secretary know that at the time?

Mr. GARNER. It was not estimated for.

Mr. KITCHIN. It was not stated at the time.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. FLOOD. It was stated here upon the floor yesterday that in England they levy a tax of 50 per cent upon all incomes in excess of $100,000. Does the gentleman know whether that is correct or not?

Mr. KITCHIN. That is not true; but England does levy a normal income tax of 25 per cent. I have forgotten how the surtaxes are levied.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from North Carolina has expired.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, I wish to state that I have as authority for that statement one of the members of the English commission.

Mr. KITCHIN. My clerk informs me that it is 42½ per cent over $50,000.

Mr. GARNER. If I understand it, the proposed amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] will get an additional revenue of about $55,000,000.

Mr. KITCHIN. Between $50,000,000 and $60,000,000.

Mr. GARNER. Unless the rates are raised so high, as contended by the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL], that less revenue will be produced than under the present rates. Undoubtedly, with the suggestions of the Secretary of the Treasury, Congress will be called upon again in December for additional revenue or an additional bond issue. It occurs to me that the wiser policy to pursue here is to take this bill and consider each item upon its merits, and determine whether or not $1,800,-

000,000 shall be raised now, and let the additional revenue to be raised go over until December, when the committee can have more time to consider it.

Mr. KITCHIN. What the House in its deliberate judgment fails to raise in this bill we can raise in December. The rates which we propose in this bill, in the brackets contained in the gentleman's amendment and in his proposed amendments hereafter, are these: Eight per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total income exceeds $40,000 and does not exceed $60,000. There the bill proposes an increase of 8 per cent. The present law is 2 per cent, which makes 10 per cent, and then there is the 4 per cent normal, which makes 14 per cent. Therefore, there is 14 per cent in that bracket which will have to be paid, and Mr. LENROOT's proposition is to make it 16 per cent.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. LENROOT. The gentleman does not mean that percentage of the total income?

Mr. KITCHIN. No; in that bracket. Our proposal is 8 per cent, and there is already 2 per cent and then the normal income, and the gentleman's addition would bring it up to 16 per cent.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. I would be glad to have the gentleman state how much the proposed increase would raise, and whether it is proposed to follow it up by further increases?

Mr. KITCHIN. It is proposed to increase each rate 25 per cent down to and including the rate on $500,000 and over.

Mr. CANNON. How much will be raised by the proposed increases all along the line under this amendment?

Mr. KITCHIN. Between fifty and sixty million dollars; that is, if they made the same income for this calendar year as last year. The estimate is upon that basis.

Mr. CANNON. That is, if the same amount was paid?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. Between fifty and sixty million dollars?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. Then I would ask the gentleman whether it is proposed—so he can answer all the questions without my interrupting—to change that one-third from the levy which is measured by the income tax of 1916?

Mr. KITCHIN. No.

Mr. CANNON. Or whether it is proposed, if these amendments are agreed to, otherwise to change the bill and eliminate some things from taxes that are covered?

Mr. KITCHIN. No; I will say to the gentleman that so far as I know all the members of the Committee on Ways and Means do not propose that, because I think we will need this and much more perhaps. What we do not raise by this bill we can raise additional next session.

Mr. GARNER. May I again interrupt the gentleman?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. If the gentleman had his preference, realizing the new information received from the Treasury Department, would he not prefer to pass this bill substantially in its present form, not accepting the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin, and let the committee in December or November or October thoroughly consider every question of taxation and consider the method of raising additional revenue to meet the necessities of the Government?

Mr. KITCHIN. If I had my real way about it, I would perhaps do that, but I think the House would prefer to raise this additional amount by the increase of the income tax, if it will raise that amount, because we know as much about that now as if we devoted six years to it. Now, the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL] has raised an interesting question——

Mr. GARNER. Before the gentleman goes to that. The committee yesterday afternoon voted by about 10 majority to increase a certain rate. I think the expression of the committee, from that vote, undoubtedly favored perhaps the increase of this all along the line, and that was with the expectation of cutting something out of this bill later on. Now, since the information comes from the Treasury Department that we need $430,000,000 more, I can not conceive that this committee will want to cut anything out of this bill that brings any revenue, and it seems to me, under these new conditions, we ought to test the sense of the committee to determine whether or not we want to increase this with a view of cutting something else out of the bill.

Mr. KITCHIN. I would not think that anything would be cut out of the bill, of course.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the gentleman's time be extended for 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I will not object to this, but I would like to inquire whether there is any expectation of finishing this bill during the month of May?

Mr. KITCHIN. Well, that is my desire, although yesterday we only read two pages and a third.

Mr. MANN. Almost all the time that has been occupied in the consideration of this bill has been occupied by members of the Ways and Means Committee, who are seeking to push the bill but occupied the time.

Mr. KITCHIN. No; we did not occupy half of yesterday.

Mr. MANN. That may be, but they are using time now. I am perfectly willing, as far as I am concerned, to defer the passage of the bill until next December. I think we are progressing very rapidly in that direction.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. If the gentleman will permit, if members of the committee will let the speaker go ahead that might expedite matters a little.

Mr. KITCHIN. As far as I am concerned, I would not take 10 minutes if gentlemen would not interrupt me.

Mr. MANN. I quite agree with the gentleman from Iowa.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the gentleman from North Carolina can proceed for 10 minutes.

There was no objection.

Mr. KITCHIN. Now, in line 7 and that bracket, between $60,000 and $80,000, the committee increased that rate to 11 per cent. The present law is 3 per cent, making it 14 per cent, and the normal tax is 4, making 18 per cent. The gentleman from Wisconsin proposes an amendment which will increase that 2¾ per cent. In the next bracket we increase it 14 per cent; it is already 4 per cent, making 18 per cent, and 4 per cent normal, making 22. The gentleman proposes to increase that 3½ per cent, and so on down. And I understand the gentleman's amendment will amount to about 50 per cent on incomes of $500,000 and over.

Mr. GARNER. Fifty-seven per cent.

Mr. LENROOT. Less than 50 per cent on five hundred thousand.

Mr. KITCHIN. And under the last bracket 50 per cent.

Mr. LENROOT. My rate would be 41.25 as against 33 per cent.

Mr. KITCHIN. That is right. As I said a while ago, that is about as high as I think we ought to go under the circumstances. I do not believe that his increase will work a great injury to these taxpayers. Now, the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL] has raised a very important question in my mind and one that we ought to consider when we are raising the rates on the larger incomes. For instance, a large exorbitant rate may frustrate the very object of the tax law, and we may not get any taxes or have any incomes upon which to levy taxes. For instance, whenever our income tax is so heavy that the total income on the investment of the business man will be anything around 3½, 4, or 5 per cent, then it will be to his interest to sell out his investment to Tom, Dick, and Harry and invest in United States bonds or State bonds or rural-credit bonds. Thus he will make just as much as if he has as much net income, with no worry and no trouble.

Mr. EMERSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. I will.

Mr. EMERSON. Somebody else would have to own those bonds?

Mr. KITCHIN. But nobody would own those bonds to the extent of making millions of income out of them, because they would be purchased by individuals with smaller incomes. This large increase in the rate would not apply to the little fellow.

Mr. EMERSON. But the exemption is $2,000.

Mr. KITCHIN. The income on each would be three or four thousand dollars. They would get practically no tax from it.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Does the gentleman suppose that anybody holding them would sell and lose control?

Mr. KITCHIN. I think a man would buy bonds if Congress would take a sufficient amount of his income and continue to take it until it would reduce his total income after deducting the tax down to 3, 4, or 5 per cent. I think I would buy bonds under such circumstances. I think any sensible man would do it. That is, if he is in it for profit or income. If he is in it for philanthropy or to benefit the human race, perhaps he would not do it. It is a grave problem suggested by the gentleman from Connecticut.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I think it is, but the gentleman should inform the committee whether or not it has his approval, because I take it he now approves of this amendment.

Mr. KITCHIN. I said, I do not see how we can oppose it if we are to raise more money at this time.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] indicated that this motion would be followed by another that would relate to incomes in excess of $500,000.

Mr. KITCHIN. He is going to increase all the brackets 25 per cent over our proposed increase.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That is one proposition already stated. Now, another proposition made by the gentleman from Wisconsin was that if this increase is attained, it will be followed by a motion to strike out certain taxes imposed on light, heat, and power.

Mr. KITCHIN. I do not think the gentleman would do that unless he could find some other way—upon excess profits, for instance, or some other item—to raise a tax on some other articles to produce the required revenue.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I would like to find out whether the gentleman from North Carolina, who seems to have fallen in line with the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT], is going with him on all fours on these additional matters?

Mr. KITCHIN. No. I will say, however, that if we are to raise additional revenue at this time in excess of the $1,800,000,000 provided in this bill, I do not see how we can oppose this increase. I am not convinced that the proposed rate will be sufficiently low to produce the revenue, and not have the results mentioned by the gentleman from Connecticut.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. It does not affect the gentleman's position in regard to other paragraphs in the bill?

Mr. KITCHIN. Not at all. I will tell you now that we need every dollar that this bill raises.

Mr. DENISON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. I will.

Mr. DENISON. I was going to ask the gentleman if he did not think the exemption of incomes on municipal bonds ought not to be removed?

Mr. KITCHIN. It is contended by some that such bonds should not be taxed by the Federal Government, because then the Government by taxation could destroy all improvements or means of improvements of cities and towns and counties and States. I doubt the advisability of the Federal Government levying a tax upon any of the agencies of the States or the municipalities.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Does not the gentleman think it is a good time to have the Secretary's letter read to the committee?

Mr. MADDEN. I would like to ask if the $400,000,000 for the creation of a new ship line is included in the statement of the Secretary?

Mr. KITCHIN. Four hundred millions.

Mr. MADDEN. Of course, that obligation would not under any circumstances be met by tax at all. It ought to be made by the issuance of securities.

Mr. KITCHIN. The question is whether we should pursue that policy or not.

Mr. HILL. Is it proper to have the letter read?

Mr. KITCHIN. I will have it read now.

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. Pending the reading of that I would like to ask the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee this question: Is it proposed that we accept the amendments offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT]?

Mr. KITCHIN. I do not see how we can oppose them if we are to raise this additional money.

Mr. EMERSON. Will the gentleman yield? Be honest about it. After the vote last night——

Mr. SWITZER. Just one word.

Mr. KITCHIN. I think we ought to defer somewhat to the will of the House.

Mr. EMERSON. That is what I mean.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a reading of the statement.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, May 15, 1917.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I want to be heard for a few minutes. I ask unanimous consent.

Mr. MADDEN. And when he gets through, I want to be heard.

Mr. HILL. When they get through, last of all, I want to be heard. [Laughter.]

Mr. McCORMICK. And I would like to file a claim. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan is recognized.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House, I conscientiously worked on this matter from the beginning and will continue to do so. I am opposed to this amendment, very seriously opposed to it. But I bow to the will of the majority, as I always do. I must do that, willingly or otherwise.

The amendment proposed by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] will increase the income tax by $96,000,000, as I take it, from the figures in the RECORD here. Those were the figures that I inserted in my remarks made last week, found on page 2125 beginning with the division of incomes from $35,000 to $45,000. I took the figure of $45,000 in order to get a fair average between $40,000 and $50,000, and therefore I have no estimate here on the $40,000 or the $50,000 income item. But the taxes collected on incomes by the Treasury Department last year on incomes above $40,000 amounted to $385,924,000. It is estimated that the taxes on incomes this year will be 20 per cent above that sum, based upon reports already in the hands of the Treasury Department, but based upon last year's taxes. This amendment, as I say, will increase the income tax $96,481,000, or 25 per cent of the amount collected last year on these incomes.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. LENROOT. I will be glad if the gentleman will explain that in detail. I did not so understand it.

Mr. FORDNEY. The taxes collected last year on incomes by the Government, on incomes from $40,000 up, were $385,924,000. As provided for in this bill, based on the number of people who paid income taxes last year, there will be collected as per provisions in this bill $385,000,000 this year. Add 25 per cent to that, which the gentleman's amendment does—if I am correct in my figures, the gentleman is proposing to add 25 per cent all the way up——

Mr. LENROOT. I add 25 per cent only to the supertax in this bill. The gentleman is talking of 25 per cent of the total amount.

Mr. FORDNEY. Then I am wrong. I figured 25 per cent on all those taxes. But, gentlemen, I believe we have gone to the limit in taxing incomes and corporations before you interfere with the business of the country. That is a thing we all want to avoid.

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. McCORMICK. Does not the gentleman think that if the amendment of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] were adopted and section 5, providing for the retroactive tax, were stricken out, the people who pay income taxes would be better off?

Mr. LANGLEY. And better satisfied?

Mr. McCORMICK. Yes; and better satisfied.

Mr. FORDNEY. I will tell you how I will be better satisfied, and I have kept away from this proposition from the beginning until now; but since you open the ball I will let it roll. I am in favor of putting a 2-cent tax on bank checks. I wish to say I now favor this kind of a tax. A 2-cent tax on a bank check of $100 or a fractional part thereof, or 20 cents on a thousand-dollar check, will not hurt any man. It will yield in round numbers $1,000,000,000, and I will demonstrate how that much tax will do it.

Last year there was paid in freight to the railroads of this country in round numbers $2,500,000,000, not including freight paid on water shipments. The railroad freight rates this year, based on the average increase of last year over the year before, will reach $3,000,000,000. Two cents on a hundred dollars, 20 cents on a thousand dollars, if that were all paid by check—and the most of it is, as I think I can show—would amount to $60,000,000. That tax will injure no man.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Michigan yield to the gentleman from Indiana?

Mr. FORDNEY. Let me conclude this statement, and then I will yield. Let me show you how far-reaching this payment of tax on the bank check is. Suppose you are a shipper of any product, say wheat. A man pays the harvest hands either in money or by check, or he goes to the bank and gets the money on a check himself. Therefore that check would pay that tax. That wheat is transported to the markets.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mr. MEEKER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may have five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. FORDNEY. I thank the gentleman. That wheat is transported by rail, and the freight is paid by check; or if the shipper draws the money from the bank itself he draws the money on the check and must pay the tax. No matter whether it is paid by the individual or a corporation, or how it is paid, the check must be given to the bank for the money by some one. That wheat goes to the mill, and the labor in the mill is paid either by a check, or a check is issued by the proprietor for the money to pay in cash. The flour is then transported by rail to the jobber, and it pays a freight charge, generally by a check, and the flour itself is paid for by check, either directly or indirectly. The flour is sold to the merchant, and then finally to the consumer, and all along the line it must pay by means of a stamp on that check.

There is no telling where it ends, gentlemen. That is the case in paying a stamp tax on a check in payment of any commodity. Take, for instance, lumber—and on lumber I know what I am talking about, because I have been a lumberman all my life. A lumberman buys a piece of timber and pays for it by check. Labor cuts the timber, and the labor is paid by check. The money is drawn from the bank and must be paid on that check. Then the labor in the mill is also paid by check. The lumber is transported by freight. The payment for the lumber is made by check. The lumber goes to the retail yard. It costs money to put this lumber in the yard and take it out again. That is all paid for by check. The purchaser of the lumber who builds a house pays for it by check or draws the money from a bank by check. The labor employed in putting the lumber into the house is paid for by a check, directly or indirectly, and so all along the line. There is no limit to the amount of money that can be raised on bank checks. The $33,000,000,000 worth of manufactured and agricultural products produced last year are paid for by the exchange of paper to the extent of about 95 per cent of its total value, 5 per cent in cash. But even that cash must be drawn from the bank by somebody by check. And all that business, in the various stages of use, from the raw material to the finished product, is transacted by check. Put a stamp tax on bank checks and no man able to have a bank account is going to be injured by a 2-cent stamp upon a bank check of $100, or two one-hundredths of 1 per cent.

Gentlemen, we are in war. The only objection to the stamp upon the bank check is that the little bank may be injured, because a man having money in the bank will put money in his pocket and pay his little bills around town in cash instead of by check. That is the danger to the little bank, but who is going to be injured by that kind of transaction? The money finds its way right back into that bank or some other bank, and, in my opinion, that scarecrow is not a justifiable objection. But I say we are in war. Who will complain at the payment of that kind of tax? No man except a croaker, because it does not injure any industry; it does not put a tax upon the gross sales of the product of any factory. Coal, iron, agricultural products, lumber, cotton, woolen goods, all conceivable kinds of manufactured articles in the land and all conceivable kinds of imports must be paid for by check.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mr. FORDNEY. I ask unanimous consent for five minutes more, and I promise I will stop then.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent that he may proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. Will the gentleman yield to me now?

Mr. FORDNEY. I will be glad to.

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. I am very much interested in what the gentleman says, and have a profound appreciation of his horse sense.

Mr. FORDNEY. Thank you, sir.

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. I want to get this before the committee. Sometimes we proceed here in very disorderly fashion and it is pretty hard to get the knowledge we are looking for. Is it your idea that we should limit the income tax to the amount proposed in the bill now in order that we may have something to tax in the future?

Mr. FORDNEY. That is the whole meat in the coconut.

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. And you believe we can easily raise $400,000,000 extra by a graduated stamp tax on checks?

Mr. FORDNEY. My good friend—and you are my good friend; you have just paid me a compliment——

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. Oh, no; I paid you that before.

Mr. FORDNEY. I know; but the gentleman is my beloved friend. I am sincere in this statement. I do believe that a 2-cent tax on a check of $100, or a fractional part thereof, will yield $1,000,000,000 without any doubt, and if we have got to have this money I know of no better way of placing that burden upon the people with the least hardship.

Mr. BUTLER. Was this proposed tax on checks considered by the Ways and Means Committee?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes; it was discussed.

Mr. BUTLER. Why was it not accepted or adopted?

Mr. FORDNEY. Well, because a majority of the committee did not want it and voted against it. Let me be frank with the gentleman.

Mr. BUTLER. Be frank and tell us all about it.

Mr. FORDNEY. I certainly will. The only way we can do things here or anywhere else is by a majority, when there are more than two men considering a question. There were some things that I did not want to see put into this law, and in consideration of that fact I agreed that I would not press this check-stamp business very hard if other matters were kept out.

Mr. BUTLER. What was the objection to it?

Mr. FORDNEY. I do not know that I could just tell you.

Mr. LANGLEY. I can tell you, if I am permitted.

Mr. FORDNEY. Some men thought it would work an injury upon small banks.

Mr. LANGLEY. I can give you my opinion of it. It would not only hurt small banks, country banks, but it would be too much of a burden on the poor.

Mr. MEEKER. Will the stamp-tax proposition come in as an amendment to this bill?

Mr. FORDNEY. I am only suggesting this way of raising this additional money asked for by the administration. If we must have it, let us be reasonable to the industries of this country that are the bone and sinew of this Nation. Our factories over the country and our farms employ our labor. I tell you there is a limit we can go to, until our incomes reach the toboggan slide.

Mr. MEEKER. Will the gentleman kindly tell us whether we are going to have an amendment offered and an opportunity to vote on this proposition? That is what we want to know.

Mr. FORDNEY. I have no amendment to offer in this line. If we must have this large sum of money, to be raised by taxation, which I have fought from start to finish—I do not believe we ought to raise $2,000,000,000 now by direct taxation, but that we ought to raise it by a bond issue, as I have repeatedly stated—but if we must have it, let us adopt a bank-check stamp tax, and we can get it without injuring any industry. Let us get away from this tax upon the gross sales of the products of any factory. [Applause.] Let us get it where it is not going to hurt anybody, as it will not by a tax upon bank checks.

Mr. LANGLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. LANGLEY. I think the objection to the bank-check tax, as I endeavored to explain a moment ago, is that it will put the burden of this tax upon 100,000,000 people, while to add an additional tax on incomes, as I shall propose, will affect only about 20,000 people, and the latter are able to stand it, while many of the 100,000,000 people can not.

Mr. FORDNEY. What objection have you to putting a 2-cent stamp on a hundred-dollar check—two one-hundredths of 1 per cent? That is all it will impose upon anyone.

Mr. LANGLEY. Oh, one stamp would not hurt, but it would amount to a good deal in a year for a poor man. Most of them, of small incomes even, keep their savings in a bank now.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Will the gentleman state what was raised by the bank-check stamp tax in the Spanish War?

Mr. FORDNEY. That law imposed a tax of 2 cents on a check of any size, and the law raised $9,000,000. I am advocating a graduated stamp tax, if any at all, of two one-hundredths of 1 per cent on all sizes of bank checks, which will yield $1,000,000,000.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, on last Monday I made the statement that the bill before the House proposed to raise $691,000,000 more than the present needs of the Government. After hearing the statement of the Secretary of the Treasury read I am more convinced than I ever was that I was correct in my figures. He says in his statement that we have $750,000,000 of deficiency for the maintenance of the Army. We have already appropriated for an army that does not exist, and we have appropriated for the army on the theory that it will exist. We are appropriating for a million men for eight months, and we have not a man of the million that we propose to raise, and will not have for the next three months. So I apprehend that there will be no deficiency in the Army appropriation at the end of the present fiscal year. We have appropriated all of the money that the Army will need.

The Secretary of the Treasury calls attention to the fact that there will be $400,000,000 needed for the construction of merchant ships. Now, everybody knows that the construction of merchant ships is not a question that ought to be involved in the taxation, in the direct taxation, of the people. He calls attention to the fact that $10,000,000 will be needed for the purchase of nitrates. Such a bill passed the Senate a short time ago. It is now before the Appropriations Committee. I do not believe that the Appropriations Committee will report any such bill, and that the $10,000,000 is not and will not be an obligation on the Government.

He reports the need of $25,000,000 for other purposes which will not be considered in any part of the conduct of the war. There are numerous items in the report of the Secretary calling for the appropriation of money and taxation of the people which are not deserving of any consideration by the Congress, because they are for things not needed and not necessary in this emergency and ought not to be considered.

Now, I want to call the attention of the committee to the fact that all this amount of money claimed to be needed by the Secretary of the Treasury is based on the theory that there is going to be $750,000,000 deficiency in the Army appropriation. His figures indicate beyond all question the truth of the statement made last Monday when I told the House that the bill before us for consideration contemplated the levy of a tax of $691,000,000 more than the Nation needed. You can not continue on in this way and maintain the confidence of the people. You must give some consideration to the needs of the people from whose resources we must finance this war. If you dry up the stream at the source you will have no supply. You are already having trouble to finance your bonds. Let us do the sensible thing. What we ought to do is to send this bill back to the Committee on Ways and Means. [Applause.]

We ought to establish a policy which we will in the future adhere to. We ought to advise the American people in advance what our policy is to be. We ought to give them an opportunity to adjust their business to the new policy of the Nation, and when they have been given that opportunity we ought to adhere strictly to the policy and collect our revenue under a systematic scientific policy.

We ought to employ the best financial brains that money will buy. [Applause.] We ought to employ the best actuaries that can be obtained. We ought to decide in advance what per cent of taxes we will levy against the people, and what per cent of securities we will issue in the conduct of the war. We ought to decide whether we will issue serial bonds, payable at different periods, and amortize the bonds issued. We ought to familiarize the people with the purpose of the Government before we begin to tax them on terms of uncertainty. It is the uncertainty in the public mind to-day that makes everybody run to cover. You will create bankruptcy all through the business world unless you establish some systematic policy along these lines. The time is here for you to act and use the good common sense which you ought to have. Call in the experts, take the time and consider this bill properly.

We do not need the money to-day; this money is not needed until 1918. We are preparing for the payment of the obligation for the year 1918. Then, why pass a bill to-day that nobody can understand and that has driven every man throughout the country into a state of uncertainty and despair?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman have one minute more to answer a question. I listened the other day or talked the other day with the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNYDER], a business man on the gentleman's side of the House, and there was no claim on his part that business was being disturbed or that anybody was afraid of the taxes proposed in this bill. [Applause.]

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. SNYDER is only one man in the United States.

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. But he is a good business man.

Mr. MADDEN. I know that, and I have respect for his judgment.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, with all deference to my distinguished colleague, the gentleman from Connecticut, there never was a more idle proposition than to send this bill back to the Committee on Ways and Means. [Applause.] The Committee on Ways and Means have undertaken to fix the items of the income tax. The House has shown by its temper and disposition that it proposes to fix it, and I have no objection to letting the House fix it. Send the bill back to the Committee on Ways and Means and let them bring in another one and the House will fix these provisions just the same as it proposes to fix them now. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] is opposed to the income tax. He wants the income taxes cut down. The House is determined to raise them. [Applause.] He wants to dispense with the excess profits tax.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I challenge the gentleman's right to make that statement.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. If the gentleman will be seated until he is recognized——

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I ask the gentleman if he will yield.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MADDEN. On what authority does the gentleman make the statement that I am opposed to income taxes?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I said the gentleman was opposed to the income taxes in this bill.

Mr. MADDEN. Who told the gentleman that?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I heard the gentleman state that, in substance, and every other gentleman did.

Mr. MADDEN. The gentleman heard nothing of the kind, and no one else ever heard the statement.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Oh, let the gentleman be seated a moment——

Mr. MADDEN. I do not propose to allow the gentleman to charge me with statements that I never uttered.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I do not care whether the gentleman proposes it or not. The gentleman has been speaking here against them. The gentleman has announced also that he is opposed to the excess profits tax. If I correctly understand the temper of the House, it is more likely to raise the excess profits tax than it is to dispense with it.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I do not want to take up much of the time of the House, and I want to go on for just a few moments. Gentlemen have stated that this bill is something that ought to be sent back to the committee, and have intimated that it is not prepared in accordance with any specific plan or in accordance with any scientific manner. I showed in my remarks last Saturday fully and completely the plan on which this bill was prepared. I showed at that time, and if any gentleman will take the time to read those remarks he will find it there, that this bill was prepared in accordance with sound principles of economics and in accordance with the accepted principles of taxation. There is not an economist in the country who has made any study of this question that will say the contrary; but, on the contrary, the plan of the bill has been beforehand approved, as I have found, by every school of economy, by every prominent economist in the country, without exception. That is the situation with reference to it.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I suggest to the gentleman that the plan was approved by the National Chamber of Commerce.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The National Chamber of Commerce, an association representing the business men of the country, from the highest down to the very lowest, had a committee appointed, composed of distinguished bankers and distinguished financiers, of economists known all over the world as men of standing and students of the question, and about a month ago those gentlemen brought in a report presenting a plan for a bill, and it is inserted in the RECORD as an appendix to my speech, and gentlemen will find that the plan of this bill is in general accord with it. I am speaking of the plan, not of the details.

Mr. HUSTED and Mr. FESS rose.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. HUSTED. Does the gentleman think that the additional $400,000,000 asked for by the Secretary of the Treasury could be equitably distributed under the provisions of this bill without further consideration by the Committee on Ways and Means?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I was just coming to that subject, and I will be glad to dispose of it. What does my friend from Ohio desire?

Mr. FESS. I wanted to ask the gentleman this question: Since the bill was written upon the basis of raising $1,800,000,000, and then overnight comes a statement that $750,000,000 more are needed——

Mr. MILLER of Washington. No; $445,000,000.

Mr. FESS. There is a deficiency of $470,000,000, I understand—well, $445,000,000. What assurance has the gentleman that next week there will not be another letter from the Secretary of the Treasury asking for another half million dollars?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. If we sit from now until next December, the gentleman will find that the estimates are continually increasing, because as we proceed with this war our expenses are going to increase right along. There is no reason for sending the bill back on that account. Even before we had finished the bill we knew that it would take more than $1,800,000,000. The gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL] in refuting the figures given by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] showed that instead of this bill furnishing too much money under the estimates which were in at the time when we prepared the bill—not now, but then—it would be about $200,000,000 short, I think.

Mr. HILL. Two hundred million dollars short?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Two hundred million dollars short, and if you increase the income tax here you still will not have enough to make that up.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. HARDY. If we adopt the plan of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN], will it not be six months before we start to pass this bill?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes; at least that long.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that his time be extended for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I understand the gentleman to favor the view that this bill ought not to go back to the committee.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. The gentleman has heard the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] change his view here about the advisability of accepting these increases of the income tax?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. And the gentleman has heard what the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY] has said?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Oh, well, I can not permit the gentleman to make a speech.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Does the gentleman not think, in view of the fact that these gentlemen have reconsidered their opinions about the matter, that the committee ought also to reconsider the bill?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. If the gentleman had done me the honor to listen to what I have said, he would know that I have stated that if you come back here in one month or two months or six months with this bill this House will fix the rates of the income tax.

Mr. LANGLEY. And that is the proper thing for the House to do.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I heard that, but that does not answer the question.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. It does not make any difference about what the committee fixes. It is said that we do not need this much money and that we ought to put the burden, by way of bonds, on future generations. I would like to have you gentlemen listen now to what some distinguished bankers and financiers of the country say about this matter. Here is the conclusion of the report of the United States Chamber of Commerce:

> Modern warfare is extremely costly, and in order to meet any appreciable portion of the expenses during its progress heavy taxation must necessarily be imposed. In European countries it is now generally admitted that far heavier taxes should have been imposed at an earlier stage of the war. The recommendations of the committee in this report are the result of a careful study of the experience of our own people in previous emergencies, and particularly of the very recent experience of other countries.

And Mr. Chase, who was Secretary of the Treasury at the time of our Civil War, called attention to the fact that the great proportion of the expenses ought to be financed as we went along and said in one of his reports in 1863, after he had had some experience with the situation with reference to the great importance of providing beyond all contingency for ordinary expenditures and interest upon debts, and for the largest possible amount of extraordinary expenses by taxation.

And he added to that:

> It is hardly too much—perhaps hardly enough—to say that every dollar raised for extraordinary expenditures or reduction of debt is worth two in the increased value of national securities and increased facilities for the negotiation of indispensable loans.

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Chairman, the situation which confronts this House is perfectly simple. There are no complications. There is no necessity for undue excitement. We are engaged in the great war, and the country is beginning to realize it and to know what it means. You can not vote armies and navies and merchant ships without voting to pay for them. Part of these additional expenditures have already been authorized by one or the other branch of this Congress. A part of them are merely estimated for. But we are going to need money in tremendous amounts, and this bill, whatever its size, will not be as big as the bill of next year. There is no alchemy by which you can avoid meeting these tremendous war expenses. You can not do it by issuing bonds. We have started in this war upon the theory that we are going to pay at least half of it as we go along by direct taxes, and if we fail to pay that amount, if we have not the courage to provide the methods of collecting one-half of the expenses of this great war as we proceed, then this country, with all its great resources, has lost the first battle in this struggle.

The bonds are not being taken with tremendous avidity throughout the country. The banks have merely announced that they think their customers will take less than a half billion dollars' worth of these bonds. We may expend here in the United States during the next 12 months of time $10,000,000,000 in money; money to be expended by this country and by our allies. You can not place out in the channels of trade this tremendous amount of money without creating prosperity such as the manufacturers and the merchants of this country have not participated in for many years past.

In England they have experienced that same sort of war prosperity. In Canada, according to the reports we get from Canada, merchants and manufacturers are enjoying a prosperity that they never even dreamed of. You can not expend this much money in a country without bringing about prosperity wherever that money goes, but you can not levy taxes without unsettling business to a certain extent, and you need not expect to do it. We will probably have to go to the suggestion of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY] and place stamps upon checks. We will probably have to graduate the stamp tax as he suggests. We had a stamp on checks before, but we succeeded then in collecting only $9,000,000 a year from that source. We will be compelled to invent new and ever new methods of taxation as this war proceeds, and we may as well understand that every man's life, every man's fortune, every man's income is pledged to the success of the United States in the war upon which we have entered.

The Committee on Ways and Means have considered this bill, and they have presented as well balanced a measure as it is possible to present, considering the fact that it is a war measure. We are not presenting a bill for the purpose of aiding business in this country. The trouble with citizens of the United States is this: They think they have been benefited in their business for a hundred years by this Government; the Government has been doing things for them, they think, and now they are face to face with the fact that each man and each woman of them must do something for this Government. [Applause.] And this is a strange and new condition for the citizens of the United States to find themselves confronted with. The chairman of the committee has stated that hereafter, as this bill proceeds through this House, the committee will meet every morning to consider the necessary additions to the bill, if any additions are found necessary by the committee, to be suggested to this House.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask for two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes more. Is there objection?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Chairman, that the gentleman may have three minutes, and request him to answer a question.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. RAINEY. The proposition now that the bill be recommitted to this committee is absolutely untenable. The bill as it stands and as far as it goes is as well-considered and as complete a war measure as it is possible for this committee or any other committee of this House to suggest. The question is not what items you are going to strike out of this bill, but the question to be presented to this committee as the bill proceeds on its way through the House is what you will add to it.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield now?

Mr. RAINEY. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman is a member of the Committee on Ways and Means and a very prominent one, and I want to ask him whether he will stand for a bill carrying more than $1,800,000,000 at the present time?

Mr. RAINEY. I will stand for any bill that is necessary to finance this war. [Applause.] And I will vote for the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] if it is necessary to adopt that amendment in order to furnish the amount needed.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman is aware of the fact that the original estimates were $3,800,000,000; $2,000,000,000 to be raised by a bond issue and $1,800,000,000 by taxation.

Mr. RAINEY. I rememebr that.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. As to that the country is now informed and knows exactly what is coming to it. Does the gentleman think it possible at this time to raise more than that $1,800,000,000 by taxation?

Mr. RAINEY. I think it is proper and possible to raise whatever amount we ought to raise in order to pay one-half of these expenses as we go along. This administration would be possessed of superhuman powers if in this great emergency, in a few days' time, it could correctly prophecy and suggest to the Congress how much money is going to be needed. You can not tell what the Congress will do. Any proposition to increase any man's salary and make any charge on the Treasury goes through Congress as if it were greased. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has again expired.

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask for two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. RAINEY. Every enlisted man, whether he serves at home or abroad, it was proposed yesterday should receive an increase of pay, and the proposition went through this House as if it were greased. The next proposition will be to make a differential between the pay of the men who go abroad and the pay of the men who stay at home of $15 or $20 a month, and that will go through this House and the Senate as if it were greased. [Laughter.] You can not make a suggestion of any kind as to any appropriation connected with this war to the Congress that is not adopted enthusiastically and with cheers. But when you commence to talk about raising the money any suggestion with reference to raising it, except to go into the industry of printing bonds, meets with but little enthusiasm here or with the people who are taxed. [Applause.]

We are conscripting our young men, who will be compelled to go to Europe to face the poisonous gases and the shot and the shell of the most completely organized and equipped army the world has ever seen. We have started to crush the mailed dragon of central Europe, and it is now the business of this magnificent new Republic to do that. A year from now we will find ourselves, I predict, the principal antagonist of Germany in the great war now raging. We can not take up this burden and hope to carry it through and keep our "place in the sun" without spending money; and every man's fortune, every man's income, and every man's life is pledged to the undertaking in which we have engaged, and we must vote this money. [Applause.]

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question before he takes his seat?

Mr. RAINEY. Yes; I yield.

Mr. LONGWORTH. My colleague has said that he, as a member of the committee approves, as the war progresses, of paying not less than one-half of all the expenses by taxation?

Mr. RAINEY. Yes.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Of course the gentleman realizes, however, that that is not the position of the committee as a whole for an indefinite period. For myself I have stated very frankly that while I was willing now to support the fifty-fifty proposition for the raising of the first amount of money necessary, I am not willing to subscribe to the proposition that this present generation, so long as the war shall continue, shall pay at least half. [Applause.]

Mr. MEEKER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. The suggestion made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] and the suggestion made by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER] show very clearly the differences in the attitude of the Members on the floor generally as to the wisdom or unwisdom of passing this bill now. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER] suggested that this bill should be adopted as it is now because we are at war. The fact of it is that is the only excuse I have heard offered by any member of the committee for voting for the bill at all.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I ask the gentleman what other excuse there is?

Mr. MEEKER. I will take that up in a moment.

Mr. LONGWORTH. It will be hard work to suggest any other.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Is not war the only excuse for it?

Mr. MEEKER. I would not vote for a bad bill for any reason—one that is not economically sound.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Would the gentleman vote for conscription, and then fail to vote the money to pay for it?

Mr. MEEKER. If the gentleman will please keep quiet about that conscription business——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I hope the gentleman will be kind enough to tell us about it.

Mr. MEEKER. I will be kind to the gentleman in a moment, in my own way. I want to say to the gentleman that, so far as conscription is concerned, I have voted to use the men who were best available for the service; and that is what I think we ought to do with our taxes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. And now we are going to vote the money to support them.

Mr. MEEKER. I will make this speech, and the gentleman can get his own time.

The gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER] suggests that we pass the bill as it is, and then have the committee meet in October, about four months from now, to prepare the next bill for December, and in the meantime to see how this has worked out during the summer. That is, after all the readjustment of business in every way to meet this taxation, if it can be readjusted in that time, and after three or fourth months of experimentation, if the industry of the country is still living, the gentleman suggests that we adopt another system.

It seems to me that the impatience of certain individuals to rush through a measure that involves only about $2,000,000,000, to have it all done here in about 30 minutes' time, is typical of the American mind. Gentlemen, if we do not start this revenue-raising system right, it is going to bring us more disaster than anything else. [Applause.] And the whole question with the men who are opposing this measure is that they are insisting that this is not a sound bill for the raising of this revenue. You may talk as you please, you are not going to get subscriptions for these bonds until the industrial and business world knows where it is at on this tax bill. You can preach patriotism all you please in an effort to get men to subscribe, but they will not do so now, because they do not know how long it will be before they are going to lose out in business. I think some of us should admit—I, for one, am willing to admit—that we are not all-wise on these tax questions. We have had this bill here for only a week to consider measures that are to reach to the very end of this long struggle, and on a five-minute debate are called upon to pass our judgment as to how this is going to affect the industrial life of our country. I think the committee should ask that the bill be sent back to it. Nobody is satisfied with it. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] was terribly concerned about conscription, and all of those things. The gentleman from Pennsylvania would not permit himself to cast his vote for any measure if he thought it was going to destroy our new conscription law. If it was going to nullify the selective-draft plan, I fancy he would stand by his convictions and vote against any such measure. I would, and I think we all would.

Now, gentlemen, let us quit talking about this being war. We all know that; but let us hold ourselves down to the one question as to whether these different items as they come through are sound, and as to what effect they are going to have upon the industries from which we expect to raise that revenue. [Applause.] A question was asked me this morning as to whether or not the men who are to manufacture munitions are still to pay their 12½ per cent profit tax which was laid on last year. The question has been put this morning by the representatives of the great jewelry industry of this country as to whether the men in this business are to be called upon to pay the 5 per cent tax on goods that they have had on their shelves, some of them for 20 or 30 years, some of the finest pieces they have carried, and whether that tax is to come on all at once, or whether they are to pay it as they sell their goods. There are a thousand questions of that sort, practical and vital to the men who are standing back at home, while we are voting the money out of their pockets and taking it out of their hides, while we stand here and talk about it. These men have a right to be heard.

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. May I suggest to you to speak to some of the business men on that side of the aisle and get their opinion on the bill?

Mr. MEEKER. I have heard it expressed privately.

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. They favor the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MEEKER. I would like two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent that his time be extended two minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MEEKER. I believe the suggestion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] is sound. We can afford to wait for 30 days. Some gentleman said to me this morning, "We want to get through and get away from here and get home." Well, the men who have got to pay these bills will be at home for a long time, and I think it is a cheap excuse for the Members of this Congress to be talking now about getting away from here to escape the hot weather. Let us stay here until we have the right kind of a bill if we have to stay until this time next year. If this bill should go back to the committee and all these things that are being thrashed out on the floor here now under the five-minute rule should be considered with the men who come here to assist in the suggestions for financing this war, I believe that it would redound to the credit of this Congress forever. We should go to the country with a bill that is not a mere makeshift, but a bill for which we do not need to make apologies, and one that the Members on both sides of the aisle can agree is a revenue system for financing the war that will stand the test of time as long as the war may last.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committe, Members on both sides of the aisle this morning have discussed this question about what we ought to do. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] has told us that we have got to raise $400,000,000 in addition to what the bill calls for.

Mr. KITCHIN. No; that is merely the statement of the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Let us understand what this is. Is this a request from the Secretary of the Treasury or only a statement?

Mr. KITCHIN. It is merely a statement showing the amount of estimates of appropriations that will be needed to meet the demands next year. He did not say that we had to raise it all by taxation.

Mr. GARNER. If I correctly understood the gentleman from North Carolina, he wants to raise the amount at this time which is specified in the bill.

Mr. KITCHIN. I said that we would need all the money raised by this proposed amendment and more besides.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. HOWARD. Yes.

Mr. MANN. How much money now does the Secretary of the Treasury say needs to be expended by the end of the fiscal year?

Mr. GARNER. He just read that.

Mr. MANN. He read the statement of the Secretary of the Treasury. Does the gentleman from Texas know?

Mr. GARNER. I know about as much as the gentleman from Illinois knows about it.

Mr. MANN. I am asking for information; and now the gentleman from Texas butts in, and he knows nothing about it. I want to know if anybody in the House knows how much it is, but nobody can answer.

Mr. KITCHIN. The statement would show about $4,000,000,000.

Mr. MANN. Yes; but how much does the Secretary of the Treasury say is needed to be expended at the end of the fiscal year 1918?

Mr. KITCHIN. That statement shows——

Mr. MANN. I know what the statement shows, but does the gentleman know? The statement was read in the House, but nobody now knows how much is to be expended, and here we are "legislating intelligently." [Applause.]

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman, I seem to be the innocent bystander. [Laughter.] I want to make a short statement and then you can get hold of the chairman of the committee again and shake him. [Laughter.] He seems to be favored for attack this morning.

I do not care what the Secretary of the Treasury's estimate in that letter is, if it is four hundred or five hundred million dollars. He is modest in his estimate, and you are going to see it. I am going to tell you why he is modest. Under the act of August 29, 1916, in the general Army appropriation bill we created an inoffensive, innocent-looking piece of machinery in this Government known as the Council of National Defense. Its operation under this bill seems to be very modest and only advisory. Seven men were supposed to get together, selected on account of their long experience and superior ability in certain lines to advise different Cabinet members therein mentioned.

I was down this morning to the Munsey Building. I found three entire floors of that large office building with hundreds and hundreds of clerks crowded together working like they were putting out a fire in a broom-sedge patch. There were expert fly speckers, chemists, analysts, insect finders, bug hunters, and people of every conceivable character on the face of the earth crowded down there into that building engaged in national defense. [Laughter and applause.]

Let me show you what has happened. I want to give you, if you will permit me to, some of the facts. If that crowd is turned loose on the Nation for six months longer, they are going to bankrupt it. That is what they are going to do. Let me show you. They have devised a rule to let no contract where the original contractor receives in excess of 10 per cent on the gross expenditures in the consummation of that contract. What will that do? Does it tend to the economy in these gigantic contracts that we are letting? No; it is a direct incentive for every man that receives a contract to raise the cost, because his profits are predicated upon total costs. The more it costs the more the contractor receives.

Let me show you how this thing works. I am not a business man; I have been accused on several occasions of being a modest kind of a lawyer. Let me tell you where the thing figures, and these good business men over here on the Republican side of the aisle will know that what I am stating is the exact truth. Every incentive on the face of the earth to the original contractor under that system is to increase the cost, because every dollar in labor increase, every dollar of increase in the cost of raw material, every dollar of increase in transportation, every dollar that enters into the cost of production of the article, everything increases the ultimate profit that that contractor will get from the Government.

I could give you an illustration of a thing that happened in the city of Atlanta. I will not put it in the RECORD, because I got it from three or four of my native contractors as to what was done there, but if these statements are authentic it is so outrageous, it is so wasteful and extravagant in practice, that I do not feel free to state it on the floor of this House without having the absolute unequivocal proof that it happened.

But I want to say that if the wings of the Council of National Defense are not clipped, and clipped promptly, and the attention of the country called to the enormous expenditures that this war will entail on the taxpayers and all interests of this country under that system of 10 per cent profit basis, it will be disastrous to this Nation. Money does not grow on trees, and when this tax bill is finally passed the people will be fully aware of that fact.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOWARD. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Does the gentleman think that we should have a press censorship that would suppress the publication of the facts which the gentleman has just given?

Mr. HOWARD. Of course not, and no other sane man does. I always maintained, I will say to the gentleman from Wisconsin, that newspapers have no right to publish matter that would state the whereabouts of our ships or the amount of our munitions, the movements of our Army or our Navy. Those things ought not to be published; they ought to be secret, and if published they ought to be visited by a severe penalty. But let the white light of the noonday sun come into these transactions where the Government of the United States is making contracts for billions of dollars and is calling upon my constituents and your constituents for untold millions to carry on this war.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOWARD. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. In view of the facts which the gentleman has just narrated and which are highly interesting, does he not think that if we do not speedily pass this eighteen hundred million dollar revenue bill the country will soon be called upon to pass a $4,000,000,000 bill?

Mr. HOWARD. I do. I want to say in conclusion that the Committee on Ways and Means has been criticized here this morning by some gentlemen unmercifully, especially by my delightful friend from Missouri [Mr. MEEKER], a wise man, as everyone knows. Nobody has to prove it, because I know that no one would more readily admit it than the gentleman from Missouri himself; but he gets up here and criticizes this committee. Oh, it is very easy to criticize; it is easy to say, "If I had the doing of this, I would not have done this, that, or the other," and then not say how you would have done it. It is no easy task for these gentlemen to lay their hands on $1,800,000,000 and do equal and exact justice to all.

Mr. MEEKER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOWARD. Yes.

Mr. MEEKER. Would the gentleman have put the 8 cent tax on gas?

Mr. HOWARD. Why, sure; I would put it on, and I would derive a greater revenue from the gentleman from Missouri than any other source by so doing. [Laughter.] We have got to take the groundwork at least of this great committee; we have got to take their recommendations under consideration and under careful consideration. We have no right to say to this great committee that we will brush aside all of their work to which they have devoted hours and days of study and examination. I hope that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] will be adopted, and these enormous incomes taxed in proportion to their ability to contribute the necessities of the Nation. These gentlemen who are submitting other plans here for the raising of revenue are trying to make up a bed for those best able to pay to lie upon in ease, so that the people of the Nation will pay this burden by their sweat and their toil upon the consumption of the Nation instead of upon the wealth of the Nation.

Mr. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY] said the situation which confronts the House is a very simple one. I agree with that statement. It is a very simple one if it is viewed properly. We are here to provide legislation to raise the money necessary for carrying on the war. The question of greatest importance, it seems to me, is as to who among our people should pay that revenue or the greater part of it. I believe that the funds necessary for the carrying on of this war should be paid by those of our people whom it will least inconvenience. The committee tells us that in addition to the bonds that have been issued we need $1,800,000,000. The amendment that is now proposed by the gentleman from Wisconsin will in effect increase the amount to be paid by those having net incomes between sixty and eighty thousand dollars a year, 25 per cent. I want to say for myself that I believe that the revenue for carrying on the war should be paid for the most part by men who have net yearly incomes of $5,000 and over, rather than by men who toil in ditches, in streets, on the farms, in factories, and offices long hours every day for just a mere living, and who have practically no net income above their frugal living expenses. The problem, I think, is simple if we view it in this way. During this war the men who have large fortunes in this country have made money more rapidly than ever before in the history of the world. I read in the paper yesterday about one man in this city who never raised a bushel of wheat in his life who is reported to have made $3,000,000 in wheat speculations on the board of trade in Chicago during the past month. Another man is reported to have made $5,000,000 in the same kind of trade within the month. Is there any reason why those men should not pay a large per cent of these tremendous profits to carry on this war? Do you think taxing a net income of $10,000, $100,000, or $1,000,000 even 50 per cent will inconvenience the owner of such income as much as levying a tax so as to increase 50 per cent or more the price of the meat, bread, tea, coffee, and sugar of the man whose total income is only $2 or $3 a day will inconvenience him and bring want and misery to the latter and those dependent upon him? I read another statement this morning showing where large manufacturing industries—iron industries, munition factories—have made during the past 12 months thousands of millions of dollars more in net income than they made in 1914 or in 1915, all as a result of present war conditions. I believe this amendment should prevail, and I believe it should be the policy of this House to secure most of the funds necessary to carry on the war during the next fiscal year from an equitable and fair tax on net incomes over and above necessary decent living expenses of the individual, from a tax upon excess profits and from a tax upon inheritances. I believe that the burden of taxation upon foodstuffs and upon transportation facilities—these burdens of taxation that will so directly and surely reach the poor man—should be very light. I do not think it should take us very long to make up this bill and make up a bill that will secure for the Treasury the funds necessary to vigorously and successfully carry on the war.

I want to say a word along the line suggested by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HOWARD]. I do not believe this Congress can reasonably expect economy in the expenditure of funds from the Treasury Department, from the War Department, from the Navy Department; nor do I believe that we can with any reasonable safety leave the matter of economy to the President of the United States, as so far he has shown no sense or idea of economy in the expenditure of funds intrusted to be expended in his discretion. If there is going to be any economy practiced in the expenditure of the funds that are raised by this and other revenue bills, that economy must be looked after and enforced by the Congress of the United States.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from North Dakota has expired.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate upon this paragraph and all amendments thereto close in 25 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that all debate upon the paragraph and all amendments thereto close in 25 minutes. Does the gentleman wish to suggest who shall control the time or how that time shall be allotted?

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have 10 minutes.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have five minutes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have more than five minutes.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have five minutes.

Mr. KITCHIN. If we are going to have the same debate, why not close upon this paragraph now and vote upon it, because the same character of amendment will be made to the remaining paragraphs, and there are five or six more? I move that all debate upon this paragraph and all amendments thereto close in five minutes.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, I do not know that I ought to take even five minutes, inasmuch as I assume and hope that this amendment is to be adopted, but I do think that something ought to be said in reply to some of the suggestions that have been made by some of the members of the Committee on Ways and Means. Some of them who are opposing this amendment are strangely inconsistent in the attitude they take. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY] and the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL] are opposed to this amendment because they say it will drive these men having large incomes to the purchase of bonds that are tax exempt, and therefore we will not get the tax we ought to have.

The gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER] says that we can not sell these bonds, that they are going to be a failure and therefore there must be a large taxation for that reason. Surely both of these statements can not be true. And the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL] and the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY] have suggested that if we increase the rates as I have proposed the rich man will avoid these taxes either by buying tax exempt bonds or by failing to declare dividends and passing profits to surplus.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman, I beg the gentleman's pardon. I have not spoken to the amendment yet and I have made no such statement, neither now nor in the past. The gentleman must be attributing that to somebody else, as I have made no such statement.

Mr. LENROOT. I understood the gentleman yesterday or the day before certainly to make that very statement. Now, I want to say with reference to any men having control of a corporation that passes profits to surplus for the purpose of escaping these income taxes that the Congress of the United States has power in the future to reach that surplus, and if any man in the United States to-day has any idea that he can escape his fair share in that way he had better take notice that he is not going to be able to do it.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LENROOT. I can not; I have only five minutes. I wish I could. Whether or not a larger amount is to be raised by this bill than proposed by gentlemen, or whether or not the bill is to be readjusted, as was argued yesterday, this amendment should be adopted. The gentleman from Michigan, in reply to a question of the gentleman from Rhode Island, said that the reason that there were not larger income taxes proposed in this bill was because they wanted something left to tax in the future. Oh, Mr. Chairman, what an argument. In this bill they tax light and heat, they tax things that the poorest man in the United States must pay for. Oh, they do not propose to leave that a subject for taxation in the future, but they propose to tax him now and let those men who have made large fortunes out of the war escape their fair share now for the purpose of having something to tax in the future. Is it not more just to compel those men to pay their fair share now and strike out some of those items in the bill like light and heat, and save that as a means of taxation in the future if it shall become necessary? As to whether or not, in part, this bill should be recommitted, every man knows that this talk of revising this income-tax schedule next December is utter folly; as this income tax goes out of the House and out of the Senate, and becomes the law, you know and I know that the income-tax schedule will not be revised next December.

Mr. HELVERING rose.

Mr. LENROOT. I can not yield. And if we propose to compel these men with large fortunes to pay their fair share of taxes we must do it now or we will not do it at all. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that we read through this section and then amendments be in order to any paragraph, so we will save so much time.

Mr. LENROOT. Might we not have unanimous consent to offer this as one amendment?

Mr. KITCHIN. And I will ask further now, when it is read, the gentleman be permitted to offer his amendment as one amendment to each one of these paragraphs.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that the section be read and that amendments to change the rate be offered in one amendment.

Mr. LANGLEY. Does that preclude any Member offering an amendment?

Mr. KITCHIN. No.

Mr. LANGLEY. Offering any number of amendments he wants?

Mr. KITCHIN. No.

The Clerk read as follows:

Fourteen per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $80,000 and does not exceed $100,000;

Seventeen per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $100,000 and does not exceed $150,000;

Twenty per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $150,000 and does not exceed $200,000;

Twenty-four per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $200,000 and does not exceed $250,000;

Twenty-seven per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $250,000 and does not exceed $300,000;

Thirty per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $300,000 and does not exceed $500,000; and

Thirty-three per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $500,000.

Mr. SWITZER. Mr. Chairman, I would like to propound a question to the proponent of the amendment.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, I will withhold the amendment that I have to offer until I have prepared it in form, and will offer it later.

Mr. LANGLEY. I want to know if it is in order to offer amendments?

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Chairman, I understand it is in order now for me to address the House for 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair did not understand the gentleman had 10 minutes.

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, it seems to me that there are two ways by which this matter——

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent, before the gentleman proceeds, that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto end in an hour.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in one hour.

Mr. KITCHIN. I will ask that it close at 3 o'clock.

The CHAIRMAN. That all debate on this section and all amendments thereto close at 3 o'clock. Is there objection?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I object for the present.

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Chairman, in my humble opinion, we could for the time being at least reach a conclusion with respect to this bill, and these observations are predicated on what was said here this morning. It is proposed by one or two gentlemen that the bill be recommitted to the committee in order that it might be reshaped and refashioned, and then be brought back here in a form that will preclude the measure from again being shot to pieces, as it seems to be now. The other proposal was made by a member of the committee that instead of putting this heavy burden upon the business interests of the country directly, by what is characterized as a monstrous imposition, that a great portion of the revenue from taxation be raised by a graduated stamp tax. We all realize that a stamp tax is a most unpopular tax, because every time a man sends a check he is confronted with the fact that he is paying a tax. That system, gentlemen, would relieve the Government of the enormous cost of collecting, which has not been referred to to any extent here, and would preclude the necessity of an additional army of officeholders to collect these taxes which are proposed in this bill.

This simple tax act would relieve the people of all burdens of detailed reports, and would be the simplest, easiest, and most economical way in which to raise this big war revenue. Therefore both of those propositions should be considered—refer back to the committee or seriously discuss the amendment of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY] as to stamp taxes. Then we will have reached a conclusion on this bill which is now so unsatisfactory and promises endless debate.

But that is not what I in particular wish to speak about. We have had generalization on this question. We have heard men talk about the burdens upon the people, about confiscation, and I want to bring right home to you, my friends, in a definite and concrete way something that can not be disputed with reference to how far-reaching the provisions of this bill are and how thoroughly unbalanced—at least as to one feature—the zone rate on second-class or newspaper postage. I had supposed the obsequies had been held over this section of the bill, that actually the post-mortem had occurred also, but it seems there are those here who want to pass this bill just as it is, and I feel it my duty before a vote is taken on this question, before we approach any nearer to it, to lay before the House some facts that are most potent and convincing.

As to this zone tax on newspapers, you have heard much. We have heard complaints about this committee in reference to it, but I do not complain of the committee, although we find the committee to have given such little consideration to an important matter like this that it naturally follows that suspicion is excited as to the injustice of many other provisions in the bill. This is so absolutely out of harmony with all business sense and reason that I can not help but believe that it might be better to have the bill go back to the committee and be overhauled, inasmuch as many members of the committee have said here that there are many features to which they are opposed, but that as a whole they would "swallow it." I do not believe the American people want us to "swallow" things with our eyes shut, nor to be, as one Congressman declared here, "rubber-stamp" Congressmen. At least I am not that kind of a Congressman. I have been for all measures looking to the support of the Government, but I am not a "rubber-stamp" Congressman, and therefore I am going to call attention to at least one feature we find here.

In central Pennsylvania there is an important enterprise that has grown up through the energy and tireless labor of a number of young men through 35 long years. They publish a newspaper that has the largest circulation of any weekly newspaper in the United States. It is known as the Williamsport Grit, with a circulation of 300,000. It circulates throughout the United States, with a very large part of the circulation in the South and Southwest, extending into these wider zones where the post-office charges would be the heaviest.

Under the new tax conditions prior to the proposal of the zone tax the increase of expense or overhead in this office for first-class mail increase, 10 per cent tariff on white paper, increase in freight rates, increase in express, and stamp tax on telegrams, and so forth—will be $40,923.98. That is a pretty fair increase of overhead charges on one printing shop in the United States. But look at what is to be added. The increase now being paid for white paper, due to war conditions——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have 10 minutes more.

Mr. DOREMUS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman have 10 minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FOCHT. I want these facts to go into the RECORD, and I want you to understand where this firm is going to land.

The gentleman fron. Illinois a while ago talked about getting excited. There will be no excitement in the Grit office, but these men are going to get ready for retirement if this bill goes through in the shape it is proposed. As I was about to say a moment ago, the increase now being paid for white paper due to war conditions is $57,500. The war tax and increased paper bill is $98,423.98. This proposed zone rate on second-class mail will raise their cost to $109,146.44, or a total war tax on this one publishing plant, reared by the energy and labor of these once young men, but now grown gray in the service, to $207,570.42. It is proposed to plunder that institution to that amount and wipe it out of existence.

The president of the Grit Co. is Mr. Dietrich Lamade, one of the best-known journalists and business men in the country, and who is everywhere beloved by the newspaper fraternity for his probity, enterprise, and exalted personal characteristics. He and his associates surely deserve a better fate than to have the honest labor of years of ceaseless endeavor wiped out and the usefulness of their great enterprise forever eclipsed as a result of this ill-advised section of the bill.

When we sat here and listened to that benevolent old gentleman, Mr. Balfour, pleading for help, and asking us to finance the bankrupt nations of Europe, we were willing out of the charity of our hearts to give to him; but let me plead to you now that we do not destroy the industries of our own country and commit, as some one said, the assinine act of drying up the spring from which flows all this revenue. If this bill passes as now framed, you will not get $207,000 from this firm; you will not get even the $40,923.98, for the spring will cease to flow.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. FOCHT. I insert herewith the statement to which I have referred:

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this paragraph and amendments thereto close in one hour.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that all debate on the paragraph and amendments thereto close in one hour. Is there objection?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman modify his request and make it 3 o'clock?

Mr. RAINEY. Yes. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this paragraph and amendments thereto close at 3 o'clock.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that all debate on this paragraph and amendments thereto close at 3 o'clock. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Chairman, by agreement with the gentleman from Wisconsin, I wish to offer these amendments at this time in advance of his.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will not recognize the gentleman now. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT] is recognized.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Chairman, I wish to say a word about the statement which was sent down this morning by the Secretary of the Treasury and which I understand is used as a basis for the argument that this bill, appropriating $1,800,000,000, is $400,000,000 short. I have read through the estimates which the Secretary of the Treasury submits, and it seems to me they do not justify the argument that is made. Most of them I concede the correctness of in specific detail. There is, to be sure, an estimate of $60,000,000 for the sinking fund, which is superfluous, because that money is never used.

The two items which seem to me novel in this statement of the Secretary of the Treasury and the only two except the $60,000,000 item, which seems to me necessary to be considered, are the item of $400,000,000 for the Shipping Board and the item of $760,000,000 for the Army.

Now, when the Ways and Means Committee submitted this bill of $1,800,000,000 they offered as the basis for that sum the statement of the Secretary of the Treasury that he must raise $3,800,000,000, and that $2,000,000,000 of that was to be paid by bonds, leaving $1,800,000,000 to be raised by taxation.

But the Committee on Ways and Means never gave us any details as to that $3,800,000,000. Whether they relied upon something which the Secretary of the Treasury may have confidentially told them I do not know; whether he specified to them these same items which he now suggests to us I do not know; but probably not, because these are bigger. But it seems to me that the House ought then to have been taken into the confidence of the Committee on Ways and Means and been told how that $3,800,000,000 was made up. I figured it up at the time and I could only make out that we needed about $3,200,000,000.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GILLETT. Yes.

Mr. BORLAND. As I caught the figures—and I think I am correct about this—the only difference in the estimate is the $400,000,000 necessary for the construction of new ships. Is not that the only difference that has been made in these estimates?

Mr. GILLETT. I do not believe that is all. It may be that that is the way the Secretary of the Treasury made up his $3,800,000,000.

As to the $760,000,000 for additional expenses of the Army, the Committee on Appropriations, when the two billion and odd millions were appropriated for the Army some weeks ago, went through the estimates which were submitted by the Secretary of War, and in that we appropriated not all they asked for, but after careful examination we appropriated all that we thought they would spend in the coming year. To be sure, we did allow that we would be back here next winter, and that it was possible that we might then have to make a deficiency appropriation. We always do. But we thought that what we appropriated then was as much as the War Department could probably expend. I think it is. I think the chances are that the War Department, unaccustomed to these enormous expenditures of money, although they may know what they want, will not know how to procure it.

The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HOWARD] complains of those who sit down in the Munsey Building, and of the way they are giving out contracts. I do not know much about that, but I would much prefer to trust the contracts to them rather than to the heads of some of the departments in Washington to-day. [Applause.] It seems to me that the difficulty is going to be in wisely expending the money already appropriated, and that they will not probably need much of this additional $760,000,000.

And take the $400,000,000 for the Shipping Board. It seems to me that if there is any sum in this bill that could justifiably be paid out of bonds, it is that; because that is purchasing the great instruments of business. It is purchasing ships which, when this war is over, will be in the hands of the Government as an asset. Some, I suppose, will be at the bottom of the sea because of the submarines; but those which are left, when we consider the condition of the merchant marine of the world at the end of this war, will probably be worth at least as much as they cost, so that $400,000,000 might justifiably be spent out of bonds.

Where it seems to me the Secretary of the Treasury is erroneous is in the claiming that this $760,000,000 for war expenses will inevitably be needed. Now, I am not saying this, Mr. Chairman, because I am out of sympathy with the purposes of the Committee on Ways and Means to raise their fifty-fifty by taxation. For one I differ with many of my colleagues on that point. I agree with the principle adopted by the committee. I applaud them for having the courage to stand by it. Much as I disapprove this bill I think we ought to go as far as we can by taxation in this first year of the war. But it does seem to me that by the statement of the Secretary of the Treasury there is a large margin left in this $1,800,000,000 to meet the emergencies of the coming year.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GILLETT. Yes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I will say to the gentleman that there is nothing of the $400,000,000 provided in this bill. That was not considered at all when the bill was made up.

Mr. GILLETT. How was the $1,800,000,000 made up? Do you know?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes; we had the details before us.

Mr. GILLETT. You did not give them in your report.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GILLETT. Yes.

Mr. LITTLE. The bill as it now stands is $1,800,000,000. When the addition is made it is $1,200,000,000. You say there is $760,000,000 additional. Do you think that would reduce it to a billion?

Mr. GILLETT. It would be about $1,200,000,000. We undoubtedly will have very much larger expenses than we expect, and we ought to make a good liberal allowance for that.

Mr. LITTLE. How much?

Mr. GILLETT. I do not know. Personally, I do not believe this bill will produce nearly as much revenue as expected, because I believe business will be exceedingly upset and disrupted, and that there will be a vast falling off of revenues. The Secretary of the Treasury thinks they can spend $760,000,000 more for war material. The Committee on Appropriations did not believe it, but when we arrived at our figures we fixed on this basis: We said, "We will give them what we think they will probably spend, but that may be too little, and if it is, Congress will be in session next winter, and by a deficiency appropriation we can make up the balance." So that, while I am willing to concede that in our appropriations we were probably below the limit, I do not think it will reach that $760,000,000.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired?

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment in conformity with the unanimous agreement, and I ask that it be considered as pending, to be voted on at the end of the debate.

Mr. HILL. Do I understand the gentleman wants to speak on the amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. That is the agreement of the committee.

Mr. HILL. Does the gentleman want to speak on the amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. HILL. He has the right to defend it if he wants to, and as a member of the committee I do not wish to crowd him out of he desires to speak.

Mr. LENROOT. I do not desire to speak. I simply want to have the amedment considered pending.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. LENROOT: Strike out "14" in line 10 and insert "17.5."
Line 13, strike out "17" and insert "21.25."
Line 16, strike out "20" and insert "25."
Line 19, strike out "24" and insert "30."
Line 22, strike out "27" and insert "33.75."
Line 1, page 4, strike out "30" and insert "37.5."
And strike out, on page 4, line 3, the word "and."
Strike out, on line 4, page 4, "33" and insert "41.25," and add at the end of line 5 the following: "and does not exceed $1,000,000"; and add a new paragraph to read as follows:
"Forty-five per cent upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $1,000,000."

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Chairman, I should like to offer an amendment and to have it read and pending.

Mr. HILL. I should like to have gentlemen understand that the proposition which has been made here is more than double the present English tax law after three years of war over there. Thirty per cent is the top rate in England, and this will be 62 per cent.

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Chairman, I desire to have my amendment read for information.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. LANGLEY] is recognized to offer an amendment.

Mr. LANGLEY. I do not desire to debate it now, but to have it pending.

Mr. HEFLIN. And then I suggest that we have some time on this side as the debate proceeds.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I suggest that that question has not been raised, about this side or that side. It may be raised if the gentleman wishes to raise it.

Mr. HEFLIN. The gentleman on that side made a speech just a moment ago to which I want to reply.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I think the gentlemen have all been speaking in the same direction, and up to date there has been no disposition to break the harmony and the enthusiasm with which this bill is being pressed to passage.

Mr. HEFLIN. I want to suggest to my friend from Pennsylvania that it might happen that gentlemen on that side might desire to consume the time that has been fixed, and then we would not have the opportunity to speak on this side.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I assume there will be ample opportunity, but the time is limited. I suggest to the gentleman that in due course he and I might differ, he upon his side and I upon mine, upon a question in which we are both interested. I do not want to disturb the harmony of the House.

Mr. HEFLIN. That is true, and I want to say something at this time in a five-minute speech.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, was unanimous consent granted to have my amendment pending and to be voted on at the conclusion of the debate?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. LANGLEY. I ask that my amendment be read.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. LANGLEY].

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. LANGLEY: Page 3, line 13, strike out "seventeen" and insert "twenty"; page 3, line 16, after the word "twenty," insert the word "five"; page 3, line 19, strike out the word "twenty-four" and insert the word "thirty"; page 3, line 22, strike out the word "twenty-seven" and insert the word "forty"; page 4, line 1, strike out the word "thirty" and insert the word "fifty"; page 4, line 4, strike out the word "thirty-three" and insert the word "seventy-five."

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I want to say at this time to the House that some gentlemen here do not seem to realize the fact that we are in war and that we ought to pass these measures without unnecessary delay. One gentleman on that side just a little while ago intimated that he was not concerned about reaching a vote, and from his speech I judge that it would not make any difference with him if it took 12 months to pass this bill.

We have passed a bill which provides for drawing an army from the body of the people of this country, and now it is necessary to raise taxes for the support of the Army and for the conduct of the war. All tax bills are unpopular. If you let the fellow who manufactures automobiles strike out taxes on automobiles, he will do it. If you let those who have a million-dollar income strike out the income feature, they will do it. This Congress has got to pass a bill that in its judgment is fair and just. Gentlemen, let us not delay this matter any more than we can help. It is sheer foolishness to talk about referring this bill back to the Ways and Means Committee. Do you know what that committee would do? I believe that it would report it back to the House immediately and you would simply be killing time to recommit it. The committee has given days and weeks of hard study on this measure, and it has brought in here a bill and now let us improve it wherever we can.

But, gentlemen, do not let us delay the passage of necessary legislation. You can not please the Kaiser—the deadliest enemy that civilization has, that liberty has, that peace has, that humanity has upon the earth—you can not please him better than to let him read day after day that we have not yet passed the tax bill, and that we have not yet passed the Army bill. [Applause.]

Lord God of hosts, be with us yet,
Lest we forget, lest we forget!

The American people expect us to act without unnecessary delay.

Some gentlemen have impressed me with the idea that they are not in any big hurry about passing a tax bill of any kind. Some have impressed me that they are not in any hurry about raising an Army. Gentlemen, the time has come for small differences, for dallying, and delaying to cease, and for us to stand together and pull together for the good of our common country. [Applause.]

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to this amendment. I was opposed to the last one, and I shall oppose it to the end. My first reason is that I do not believe an increase in these rates will raise any more money or, if so, very little. I will come back to that in a minute. In the second place, one gentleman, who seems to be greatly interested, and I justify him, says he wishes this to be done in order to strike out what he is pleased to call the retroactive tax by and by. In other words, it is a proposition to increase a part of the income tax in order to strike out another part of the income tax, which does not strike me as very consistent.

Another reason given for it is that we are going to raise some money to reduce the transportation tax, and so forth. Well, the transportation tax here is $172,000,000, and we have not heard here to-day any claim that this change in these amendments will raise over $85,000,000, in which case it will not take care of the transportation tax, and it will not take care of the retroactive provision, as you choose to call it in this bill.

Now, my reason for thinking that it will not bring in much, if any more money, is this: Take your pencils a minute when you get a chance and you will find out that at an income-tax rate of 12½ per cent it is an even stand-off between a 3½ per cent bond tax free and a 4 per cent bond taxable under the income tax. So that the moment you go above 12½ per cent you offer a premium for a substitution of tax free bonds for 4 per cent taxable bonds.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. May I interrupt the gentleman for the purpose of asking him a question?

Mr. HILL. Yes; if you will be brief.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. If it should have the effect the gentleman suggests, of causing capitalists to invest their money in nontaxable securities, would there not be some compensation in the fact that it would increase the market for some bonds that are not going very rapidly?

Mr. HILL. I do not care to go into that at all. I simply say there is a law of economics which can not be avoided, and if you run up against it you are going to get hurt. I am not talking about any individual or anything of that kind. I simply say that if you increase the income-tax rate above 12½ per cent it will have a tendency to drive 4 per cent investments into some kind of tax-free bonds. Raise your rate to 30 per cent and you will drive 5 per cent investments into tax-free bonds. You raise it to 42 per cent and you will drive 6 per cent investments into tax-free bonds. You raise it to 50 per cent and you will drive the 7 per cent investments into tax-free bonds. There are about twenty-five billions of tax-free property in the United States now. We have authorized an unlimited issue of farm mortgage 4½ per cent bonds. I read an enthusiastic appeal to the people of the United States in the paper last night to invest in those bonds. Every motion to increase the rate is a motion to increase the change from the taxable securities into the tax-free securities.

We settled that question, in my judgment unfortunately, a month ago. It is a fact—I may be mistaken—that you have legislated to the point of diminishing returns in the bill as it stands, and that the increase of these rates is unfortunate as a revenue-producing proposition.

As a proposition of justice, of course, there is nobody for a moment who supposes that either of these propositions are just. The proposition advanced by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] levies 62 per cent as the high-rate tax. The high-rate tax of Great Britain to-day is 30 per cent. This leaves ours at 62 per cent. The amendment proposed by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. LANGLEY] puts it at 91 per cent. It is just as easy to say 291. Of course it is not necessary to argue a proposition of that kind. I shall vote against any amendment to this proposition. I was not in favor of carrying it beyond the revenue-producing point in the committee.

[The time of Mr. HILL having expired, he was given 10 minutes more.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, a little in the way of personal explanation. I fought this bill to the last day in the committee. For 128 years this Nation has depended on duties at the ports for its revenues. There was not a dollar of revenue of that kind in this bill up to that morning. I say that you can not finance this war on direct taxation of the American people. They will not stand for it. [Applause.] You can not do it. I said to the committee, "I will stand with you if we can widen the base and spread the taxation preparatory to a long war"; and when even the pitiable tariff items that are in here now were put in I said, "I consider myself in honor bound to stand by this proposition." I had a motive in my action this morning when the statement came in from the Secretary of the Treasury, and I asked the chairman whether he proposed to increase this bill to cover that amount. I am relieved from any pledge to support this bill in view of the vote that has just been taken. I will use my individual judgment hereafter as to any amendments offered on this bill.

Mr. Chairman, I came into the House with the determination to loyally stand by this bill as it was, giving the best reasons I could for its support, and loyally accept defeat if we were defeated on any proposition. I had a reason for that. I did not make up my mind hastily as to the position I would take on this bill. I went back 19 years ago to refresh my memory as to what happened during the Spanish War. I have the record here. A Republican administration was in power, and a bill was brought in to pay the expenses of that war. The Democratic Party stood up and demanded that the Republican bill should not be passed, and Mr. Bailey offered as a substitute for it an income tax. Here is the vote—134 in favor of an income tax, 171 against it, and 42 not voting. It was defeated. Exercising their constitutional right, the Democratic Party, in the person of Richard Bland—and my friend will remember it—offered a proposition to pay the bills of the war by issuing greenbacks. That was defeated; and then what happened? The bill came to a final passage to pay the expenses of this Government, under a Republican administration, during the Spanish War. Gallant Joe Wheeler voted to pay them, and one or two others. The vote on that motion was 181 yeas, 131 nays, almost solid Democratic opposition to paying the expenses of this Nation in that war under a Republican administration.

I did not want to see that done now. I wanted to see both parties come together, and I said I will stand and beg and plead with my Republican colleagues "to come up to the help of the Lord against the mighty" and stand with the Democratic administration in the prosecution of this war. But to-day the very bill they bring in is repudiated by the men who prepared it. I would not have prepared the bill in that way. I would have secured a thousand millions, if necessary, from the tariff. What are you doing? Thirteen hundred and seventy million dollars of this bill you do not get until a year from next June. Thirteen hundred and seventy millions! What is this administration to do in the meantime? Issue certificates, sell bonds, issue two billions of certificates. The Secretary says in that statement that he wants four hundred millions made immediately available. You can not get it out of that bill. If the tariff provision was in there, if the bill was passed you would commence to collect the duties to-morrow morning. I tried to get them there. There was an amendment, which I submitted in the committee, which would have raised $365,000,000, and they would have been collecting it before this time if the bill had become a law.

Now, here is the proposition. What are we going to do? I asked the chairman of the committee what he was going to do on subsequent amendments? Are we going to strike out the postage because somebody does not like it; are we going to strike out the retroactive clause because somebody does not like it? I say, let us stand for the bill and go down in defeat if necessary rather than embarrass the administration. There is the situation. It can be done; there is no trouble about it at all, Mr. Chairman.

There are two things that stood fundamentally in the way of this bill; one is sugar and the other is tobacco. We might as well understand it. The bill could be made to meet the expenses of the Government by taxation to the extent demanded by the Treasury. Somebody has asked two or three times why we did not get $40,000,000 out of confectionery or candy. The Secretary of the Treasury recommended it, and we could get it. I have his recommendation here. You know why, because it is made of sugar. It is just as certain as the world. If it was made of steel or iron there would be no trouble; if it was made of lead there would be no trouble. Why, we are practically ignoring the policy of the United States for 128 years and casting into the discard the only policy by which we could collect from the people of the United States enough revenue to-morrow morning if the bill was a law. [Applause.]

If we are to adopt a policy so utterly different from what I understood it was to be, I can not see that I can be pledged any longer to stand by the proposition.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HILL. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. In conversation here there are some of us who do not understand precisely what the gentleman from Connecticut means by his reference to sugar and tobacco.

Mr. HILL. Oh, the gentleman is too innocent.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Why, Mr. Chairman——

Mr. HILL. Oh, he is altogether too innocent.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman permit?

Mr. HILL. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin I do not think it would become me as a Member of this House to rise and ask a question like that unless I meant precisely what I said. I do not know what the gentleman means when he says the trouble is sugar and tobacco. The gentleman has impugned my good faith in asking that question. I am not accustomed to say upon this floor what I do not mean. The two gentlemen who sit across the aisle from me, when I asked them what the gentleman meant by saying sugar and tobacco, both turned to me and said they did not know. Nor did I know, and I do not now know.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman, here is an estimate of items which could properly be considered as fit subjects for taxation aggregating $2,703,000,000. It is not a Republican estimate. No Republican had anything to do with it. It went to the Treasury Department. Out of that came this estimate providing for $1,807,000,000. In it is this item of sugar, $92,000,000, and so it goes on and gives various items, a great many others that I shall not take time to read now.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. What about tobacco?

Mr. HILL. I introduced an amendment absolutely confined to the recommendations of the Secretary of the Treasury, with one exception. I did not want to hurt any man in the sugar industry, and when I offered my amendment proposing to put an excise tax of 1 cent a pound upon it I included an additional duty of 1 cent a pound. We would then have obtained $150,000,000 out of sugar, at the same rate that Great Britain charges to-day. I included in my amendment a duty on tea and coffee. I was voted down. That is all right. I accepted it loyally, and I accepted it up to this time, when it is apparent that the members of the committee themselves are not going to stand by their own measure.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HILL. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Connecticut has expired.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman be permitted to proceed for five minutes more in order to answer the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER].

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for time in which the gentleman may conclude his remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that the time has been fixed at 3 o'clock when the debate shall conclude.

Mr. CANNON. I ask unanimous consent to extend that time, so as to permit the gentleman from Connecticut to conclude his remarks.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I understand that debate, by unanimous consent, closes at 3 o'clock.

Mr. CANNON. I have put the proposition to extend the time, so as to allow the gentleman from Connecticut to conclude his remarks.

Mr. KITCHIN. How much time does the gentleman want?

Mr. HILL. I will not be long. I think 10 minutes would give me all the time I want.

Mr. KITCHIN. I hope the gentleman from Illinois will modify his request by extending the time for 10 minutes.

Mr. CANNON. If the gentleman sees proper to object to my request, he can do so.

Mr. HILL. Make it 15 minutes.

Mr. KITCHIN. Make it 15 minutes, so that the time for concluding debate shall be 3.15 o'clock.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois accept that modification?

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman from North Carolina desires to object, he can put his own proposition. I ask unanimous consent that the time be extended, so that the gentleman may be permitted to conclude his remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Connecticut be permitted to conclude his remarks, not to be taken out of the time already allotted.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I will ask the gentleman from Connecticut if he is satisfied to make it 15 minutes?

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I ask for the regular order.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. KITCHIN. I object.

Mr. HELVERING. I object.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended for 15 minutes, not to be taken out of the time already fixed, so that debate shall close at 3.15 o'clock.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Connecticut be permitted to proceed for 15 minutes, not to be taken out of the time fixed. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HILL. I can not yield now. Mr. Chairman, I have been quoted as saying that I favored the recommittal of this bill. I heard the statement of the Secretary of the Treasury read, and I asked the chairman of the committee if he intended to accept or not to oppose the amendments which were being made to the income tax part of the bill. I said then that in my judgment it would be utterly impossible to get this bill amended so as to cover this on the floor of the House, and if the addition of $400,000,000 necessary for the vigorous prosecution of the war was to be provided for in the bill before its final passage, it ought then to be recommitted. I am in favor of standing by the bill as it is.

The question was asked me wherein sugar had any bearing upon the construction of this bill. I introduced an amendment when we had reached the point of having provided $1,500,000,000 and there was still $300,000,000 more to raise to meet the demand of the administration. I took simply and solely the items which the Secretary of the Treasury had recommended, and the amendment provided for $365,000,000. If we had taken the item on sales of tobacco, which the Secretary of the Treasury had recommended, it would have materially decreased that deficiency. If we had taken the items on sugar which the Secretary had recommended it would have very largely decreased that deficiency. If we had taken other items which the Secretary had recommended there would have been no trouble about making up this bill without excessive taxation in any one direction.

It was not my proposition; it was far, very far, from my political ideas and views, and with three changes only, was what may well be considered an administration proposition.

Here it is. Now, I offered such an amendment. I am going to take time in my 15 minutes to read it:

SEC. —. On and after the day following the passage of this act there shall be levied, collected, and paid, in order to provide additional revenue to defray war expenses, upon the following-named articles when imported from any foreign country into the United States, or into any of its possessions, except the Philippine Islands and the islands of Guam and Tutuila, as additional to any existing rates of duty on said articles, the said rates to be enforced during the continuance of the present war, viz:

Crude rubber, 20 per cent ad valorem; manufactures of rubber and articles in which rubber is the component material of chief value, 10 per cent ad valorem; hides and skins, 10 per cent ad valorem; manufactures of leather and articles in which leather is the component material of chief value, 5 per cent ad valorem; wool, 10 per cent ad valorem; manufactures of wool and articles in which wool is the component material of chief value, 5 per cent ad valorem; raw silk, 20 per cent ad valorem; manufactures of silk and articles in which silk is the component material of chief value, 10 per cent ad valorem; vegetable fibers, 10 per cent ad valorem; manufactures of vegetable fibers and articles in which vegetable fiber is the component material of chief value, 5 per cent ad valorem; lumber, 10 per cent ad valorem; manufactures of lumber and articles in which wood is the component material of chief value, not including wood pulp, 5 per cent ad valorem; tin, 10 cents a pound; cotton, unmanufactured, 2 cents a pound—

The Secretary has recommended every one of those things—

Manufactured cotton and articles in which cotton is the component material of chief value, 10 per cent ad valorem; coffee, unmanufactured, 6 cents a pound, manufactured, 20 per cent ad valorem; tea, 12 cents a pound—

Those three items of tea, coffee, and sugar would have given $240,000,000—

Cocoa, crude, 20 per cent ad valorem; prepared cocoa and chocolate, 10 per cent ad valorem; all oils bearing no duty under existing law, 10 per cent ad valorem; fruits and nuts, 10 per cent ad valorem; works of art, 20 per cent ad valorem; furs, 20 per cent ad valorem; tanned leather, 10 per cent ad valorem; manufactures of iron and steel, 10 per cent ad valorem; antiques, 50 per cent ad valorem; sugar, 1 cent a pound.

SEC. —. On sugar and glucose manufactured in or imported into the United States there shall be levied and collected an excise tax of 1 cent a pound, and the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby directed to make regulations therefor and collect such tax.

This provided for the absolute prevention, as it seemed to me, of any criticism on the part of anybody in the United States of any desire to injure any particular industry, so I added 1 cent a pound to sugar, and then provided on sugar and glucose manufactured or imported into the United States there shall be levied and collected an excise tax of 1 cent a pound, and the Secretary of the Treasury was directed to make regulations therefor and collect such tax. Now, the whole thing was spoiled because the committee did not—and I bowed to it, and I bowed to it loyally and faithfully—did not see fit to include an excise tax and duty on sugar. That took out $150,000,000 from this proposition in one fell sweep, and it therefore became necessary to go to something else to take its place. The gap was filled by what is called the retroactive tax, against which there is much opposition. I loyally accepted the situation, and I tried to stand by the bill, but if the bill itself is to be emasculated or be destroyed, or rates which, in my judgment, were too high before are to be raised still higher, and we are going to raise the amount of money by piling one tax on top of another and another on top of another, I simply say, just as I have said to the House and said to the committee, I reserve to myself the right now to exercise my individual judgment. It will not make any difference, it is only one vote, but I have stood in the face of denunciation and severe criticism by my own people at home because I stood by this bill. I was trying to stand by a Democratic administration. I had offered alternative propositions, and they were voted down, and I accepted it; but the trouble is, in my judgment, that it is a question of governmental policy, the difference between you gentlemen and me. [Applause.] There is where the difference is.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HILL. Yes, sir.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That same Democratic administration now having intimated to the House that it needs instead of $1,800,000,000, $2,245,000,000, does the gentleman think that this bill ought to contain a provision——

Mr. HILL. I have been acting loyally, in accordance with the plan proposed, and I was willing to go back in the committee and try to raise the $445,000,000 on Democratic principles. I could not have done it without touching the luxuries, tobacco, sugar, which is the most widely distributed product in the United States, and puts a tax more equitably upon everybody than any other. I was, as I say, ready, as a Republican, to go back in the committee and try to raise this money if we had to raise it. I felt in accordance with my understanding that it was my duty to stand by you gentlemen in the defense of this bill, but when you gentlemen, two of my colleagues, just now announced that you are not going to stand by the bill in one of its most essential features, the largest single item in it—the income tax—what am I to do? I simply withdraw from the agreement to stand by this bill and say, as I said before, that I shall use my individual judgment concerning it hereafter. [Applause.]

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, I want especially to speak in opposition to what was said by my colleague from Missouri [Mr. MEEKER] and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN]. If I correctly interpreted their remarks, and they were serious in their suggestions—if they really meant that the effort to form a tax bill at this time ought to be abandoned and that this measure ought to be committed to some indefinite body of experts that we are not able to designate in order to be studied over for an indefinite length of time, I want to say, without hesitation, that their suggestion is the most damaging that could be made.

Mr. MEEKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BORLAND. If the gentleman will make his question brief.

Mr. MEEKER. I only want to say that I am in favor of sending this back to the committee and let the committee conduct hearings; that is all.

Mr. BORLAND. I have none of the apprehension that the gentleman expresses, that this bill is going to ruin or disturb business. If I correctly interpret the opinion of the committee, business will not be seriously disturbed. The Republican members of the Ways and Means Committee evidently so felt at the time they reported the bill. The gentleman in predicating his whole remarks upon the idea that somebody's business is going to be ruined started out on a false basis. But that is not all. He started out on a false basis by assuming that any business man of this country, the investors and holders of idle capital, are going to invest in bonds of our Government if we have no tax bill to support those bonds. Yet the gentleman would have us go out, as we are now going out, he having voted for it, I think, and sell $4,000,000,000 worth of securities without a tax bill to support them and without any concrete plan of where the taxes will come from to support them.

The plainest dictates of economic common sense is that we have a tax bill to support the bonds when we offer them to the American public. If the gentleman has learned the first principle of economics, he has learned that at least. I am very glad there has not been any partisanship in this debate so far. I regret exceedingly that the distinguished gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL] has announced his intention not to abide by the general support which he has so generously given the bill. I would say, if I were disposed to compliment the gentleman, that he had won a great victory in putting that 10 per cent blanket tariff tax into this bill and getting the Democrats to vote for it, and he ought to be amply content with that magnificent victory. We do not want to vote for it any more than he wants to vote for an increase in the income tax, but we are each trying loyally to do the same thing, to wit, to sustain the necessary strain upon the American Government at the present time. And that duty is just as imperative upon the minority as it is upon the majority now.

I regret exceedingly to see a form of tax put into this bill which, as I believe, takes $10 out of the consumer for every dollar it puts into the Treasury. I would prefer to take $10 out of the pockets of the American consumer and put that $10 into the American Treasury, if I were going to tax the consumer at all. That is my idea of the tax. The gentleman has succeeded, and I think by loyal effort on his part, to cooperate with other members of the committee, in putting on this bill a tariff provision. Many of us object to that provision and only vote for it on the imperative necessity of agreeing promptly on an efficient tax bill. I think the same inducement, argument, and impulse that led the gentleman from Connecticut to support this bill will lead him still, even though the membership of this House, some on his side and some on ours, conclude to change in material matters some of the features of this bill. I want to remind him that the proposition to increase the income tax came from the Republican side, and I am going to support it on a nonpartisan basis.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

Mr. EMERSON. Mr. Chairman, I would like to offer these amendments and ask to have them read and voted on at the end of the discussion.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio offers amendments, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendments offered by Mr. EMERSON: Page 3, line 13, strike out lines 13, 14, and 15 and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"Fifty per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $100,000 but does not exceed $200,000."

Page 3, line 16, strike out lines 16, 17, and 18 and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"Sixty per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $200,000 but does not exceed $300,000."

Page 3, line 19, strike out lines 19, 20, 21, 22, 23, and 24, and on page 4, lines 1, 2, 3, 4, and 5, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"Seventy-five per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $300,000."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. SCOTT] is recognized.

Mr. SCOTT of Michigan. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, in the bill now before the House you are attempting to raise by taxation the most stupendous sum of money ever levied by any nation since the origin of time. I realize that it is much easier to criticize than to create, and it is in no spirit of disrespect to the honesty of purpose and the arduous and conscientious work which has been performed by the Ways and Means Committee that I am unable to agree to several items contained in this measure.

In this bill you are presuming to lay the foundation for a system of taxation which will bring sufficient revenue to pay the unprecedented expenses of this Government during the continuation of the present war. The unusual taxes which you impose and the unusual system of taxation which you intend to follow during this war should have the most deliberate consideration, not only of the Ways and Means Committee but of the entire country. I insist that such consideration has not been given to the preparation of this measure. Not a single hearing has been had, and the people of the Nation who must pay this mammoth sum of money have virtually been precluded from presenting undeniable facts, the knowledge of which would have materially changed a number of items in this bill. Every member of your committee has supported the bill with an apology, and I ask you with what less respect and confidence can you expect it to be received by the tax-paying public.

The war-revenue bill should be the very last measure considered by the House, because at that time you would have a much better conception of the amount of money necessary to be raised than you possibly can have now. This bill was presented to the House on May 9. It contained the sum of money which, in the judgment of the officials of the Government and the entire membership of the Ways and Means Committee, was necessary for the next fiscal year. Yet to-day—seven days after you report this bill—you present a statement from the Secretary of the Treasury which says that it will be necessary to raise $425,000,000 more than this bill provides. To accomplish that end the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] has indicated that he will not oppose the amendment suggested by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT], which purposes to raise the surtax 25 per cent on all annual incomes in excess of $20,000. I do not know that the gentleman's amendment is a sufficient increase, but I supported it, because the man who has a net income of $20,000 a year or more is infinitely better able to share the expense of this war than the man who is earning $2 a day at manual labor.

In the brief time I have, it will be impossible for me to attempt to cover the various items in this bill which I consider to be untenable and fundamentally unsound, but as an illustration on page 48 of the bill you levy a tax of 1 cent per pound on coffee and 2 cents per pound on tea. This only applies to the wholesaler, and in the last analysis everybody knows the consumer pays the tax. If the committee had all the necessary information before them in the preparation of this provision, I would like to ask the committee how they can reconcile the situation I have in mind—and it must exist in every State in this Union. The largest wholesaler in my home State, outside of Detroit and Grand Rapids, sells about 5,000 bags of coffee every year, and under the terms of this bill he is taxed, but the Jewell Tea Co., of Chicago, who sell on an average of 30,000 bags of coffee every month, is not required to pay one cent of tax under the terms of this bill. If you really wish this item to be just and fair, and if you desire to get the revenue, I want you to explain to me why you have picked out the wholesaler, who supplies the small town and country population, to pay this tax and have exempted such gigantic and rich concerns as the Jewell Tea Co., of Chicago; the Great Atlantic & Pacific Tea Co., of New York; Jones Bros., of New York; James Butler, of New York; Thomas Roulston, of Brooklyn; Montgomery Ward & Co., of Chicago; Sears, Roebuck & Co., of Chicago; and many other like concerns.

Mr. KITCHIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SCOTT of Michigan. Certainly.

Mr. KITCHIN. The committee already have an amendment which proposes to tax all tea and coffee in the hands of all persons, except 50 pounds of tea and 60 pounds of coffee.

Mr. SCOTT of Michigan. I am glad to know that the committee has consented to such a valuable correction to the bill. If we consider the measure long enough, there is a probability that many other valuable corrections will be made, so that it will raise the revenue necessary and will not unjustly injure and even bankrupt the concerns of the country who employ labor and the people themselves.

I question the advisability of your flat tax of 5 per cent on the output of an industry. If it is necessary to take a part or all of their profits, I will vote for it; but do not close your eyes and put them completely out of business, and thus throw out of employment the thousands of men who are in their employ. I have only attempted to call attention to a few of the provisions in this bill which seem to me to be fundamentally unsound. This war will require several tax-revenue bills even larger than the one now before us, and I therefore appeal to the membership of this House to seriously consider the terms and provisions of this first revenue bill in order that the injury done may not be wholly disproportionate to the revenue derived. I am sure you gentlemen must be cognizant of the fact that before we became a party to this war every one of our allies had received enormous credit in this country. The Russian Government had floated a bond issue of $100,000,000 here and France, Italy, and even Great Britain have also drawn upon our wealth and prosperity; and if we, in this bill or any other bill, should cripple or materially impair the concerns in this country I dread even the thought of what the result would be, because this country is now the only Nation on earth which is able to sustain itself and contribute to the support of mankind. [Applause.]

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, whatever criticism may be made of this bill, in my opinion the Committee on Ways and Means is to be commended for having realized at the outset the necessity of financing a great part of the extraordinary expenses of the Government at this time through taxation. [Applause.]

The history of the attempts to finance previous wars of the United States shows that every attempt to finance a war by long-time or short-time loans has resulted inevitably in financial disaster. It was not successful in the War of 1812, and it nearly bankrupted the United States in the Civil War. It increased the cost of the Civil War by hundreds of millions of dollars because of the inflation and depreciation of the currency of the United States.

The true financial policy is to resort to taxation and loans to such an extent as will enable the Government to obtain by taxation as large a proportion of the money needed as can be obtained without absolutely crippling or paralyzing the industries of the country. If the Committee on Ways and Means has determined at the outset to obtain by taxation 50 per cent of the money required at this time it has done more to establish upon a firm basis the credit of the United States and to make possible the borrowing of money on the obligations of the United States than anything else that has been done or proposed. [Applause.]

We must not shut our eyes to the tremendous task which confronts the American people. We are proposing to spend, to loan, and to raise money on a scale never contemplated by any government before we have actually commenced the grim work of war, and it will necessitate rigid economy not only in governmental matters but in private affairs. It means the elimination of innumerable things that heretofore had been considered as essential for the country but not imperatively necessary for the people.

I have examined the statement of the Secretary of the Treasury, which has been read, and I have had made an analysis of our financial situation from a somewhat different standpoint. I have had in mind roughly the fact that we would expend by the 30th of June, 1918, as we know the facts to-day, $5,100,000,000. That is exclusive of deficiencies to be met hereafter, changes of conditions, new situations, or anything else. It shows that for the ordinary expenses of the Government, as provided in the annual appropriation bills, the total expenditures in the next fiscal year will be about $1,993,205,452.45. Eliminating the postal appropriations, $331,851,170, the sinking-fund requirements on our present basis of $60,748,000, and $40,030,136.30, which is 2½ per cent of the sums appropriated in the annual acts, which is usually unexpended, giving a total of $432,629,306.30, we have a contemplated expenditure for the ordinary expenses of the Government, including those extraordinary provisions for the national defense carried in the regular appropriation bills, of $1,560,576,146.15.

Then there was $68,020 in a deficiency bill, $7,063,946.46 for the issuance of the bonds, the pending emergency national defense deficiency bill of $3,390,394,381.22, and interest on $2,000,000,000 of bonds at 3½ per cent, $70,000,000. There are pending food-control bills carrying appropriations of $24,510,000, and $50,000,000 requisite for the war-risk insurance brings the total estimated expenditures to June 30, 1918, to $5,103,164,493.83.

The estimated revenues under existing laws are $1,249,750,000. We have authorized bonds to the extent of $195,256,292 for the Alaskan Railroads, for the Mexican situation, for the Danish West Indies——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I would like to have five minutes if I may.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended 10 minutes, and that the time of general debate be extended 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Colorado asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from New York be extended 10 minutes, and that the time of general debate be extended 10 minutes.

Mr. MANN. There is no general debate.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. KEATING. This is a very important statement, as a matter of fact. That would make it 3.25 o'clock.

Mr. LANGLEY. Reserving the right to object, I have offered one amendment. I would like to have one minute.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It makes, Mr. Chairman, as at present advised, practically two months before the fiscal year commences, an estimated expenditure of $5,103,164,493.83; and to meet these expenditures we have, under the existing law, revenues of $1,249,750,000 and bond authorizations of $195,256,292 under previous legislation and $2,000,000,000 under the act that was passed recently.

If all those bonds were issued and the estimate of the revenues as made realized, the revenues in the next fiscal year, both from those loans and the tax laws, would aggregate $3,445,006,292, leaving $1,658,158,201,83 additional revenue required, as we are at present advised. I understand that it is estimated that the pending bill will raise $1,800,000,000. We must in addition, however——

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MADDEN. Does that include the $400,000,000 for the ships?

Mr. FITZGERALD. It includes everything.

Mr. MADDEN. And the $750,000,000 deficiency, as stated by the Secretary of the Treasury?

Mr. FITZGERALD. It includes all of the deficiencies provided for or requested at the present time, but not the sum of $760,000,000, which the Secretary of the Treasury states will be required for the War Department in addition to the sums already requested. It does not provide deficiencies that may be requested and necessarily will be incurred in the next fiscal year. It includes $400,000,000 for ships, but does not include $350,000,000 additional for which it is proposed to give authority to contract, and it does not include the expenditure of $250,000,000 additional for the same purpose which has been stated by those who are supposed to know our requirements would be essential. So that if we were to assume that, in addition to the $400,000,000 for ships, there would be required about $600,000,000 additional for ships, it would bring the obligations of the Government to $2,200,000,000 in excess of the amounts that now can be obtained, without providing the additional sums suggested as needed by the War Department.

But there is something else. We have agreed to extend credit to the amount of $3,000,000,000 to the allies, and the wealth of the country must be utilized in the flotation of that loan. That is in excess of the sums already mentioned. While it is true that under the arrangements of the law there will not be any carrying obligations for that loan, the money to advance to the allies must be obtained by loans from the public.

It is stated in the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury that $760,000,000 additional will be required for the War Department next year. When the emergency war deficiency bill was before the House it was pointed out that the estimates of the War Department had been based upon the cost of raising, equipping, and maintaining for one year in the field an army of 1,000,000 men, and it was stated that the appropriations for subsistence, pay, and some other items were recommended upon a two-thirds basis, upon the theory that a million men would not be under arms for the entire year, and upon the further theory that if the organization of that army proceeded more rapidly than was then believed possible by the committee that provision could be made for those items during the next session of Congress, which would convene in December, without any embarrassment whatever to the Army. But Congress, in the bill to increase temporarily the Army of the United States, authorizes in addition the raising and equipment of 500,000 additional men. No one can say just what the necessities of the United States will be for man power in the next year. Of course, we all hope that it will not be necessary ever to send a great force of men abroad, but no one knows just what demands will be made upon the United States to replace the wastage of men at the scene of the great conflict in Europe.

If before the 1st of January conditions should be such that either because of changed conditions in Europe, or because of the belief that the situation was such that it was imperatively necessary that we should prepare for the use of an army right at home, then the administration would necessarily commence to organize or to raise and equip the additional 500,000 men provided. As the figures are to-day, before we have commenced to organize and raise an army, before we have commenced to take part in the military operations upon a scale that can be considered as significant, the obligations for which we must make provision between now and the 30th of June, 1918, is $5,103,164,493.83. If this bill lacks anything, it is that it does not provide enough money to meet those expenditures. We can not draw close and sharp lines in attempting to finance these great operations. We had much better have legislation that will bring into the Treasury a surplus sum instead of an insufficient sum.

While I have the chance I desire to commend to the members of the committee and urge them to read a little pamphlet that has been sent out within a day or two entitled the "Financing of the War," written by Dr. Charles J. Bullock, professor of economics at Harvard University, in which he gives more valuable information in a brief summary than can be obtained in any other place. Those who want to go more deeply into the subject should read Prof. Henry C. Adams's books on the Science of Finance and Public Debts.

I have been impelled to make this brief statement in the hope that I may be of some service in removing from the minds of Members the impression that we are either getting too much money or providing too much. The wisest thing the Ways and Means Committee has done and the most beneficial thing for the Government is at the outset to realize the necessity of obtaining a very considerable sum, as large a sum as possible, for the payment of these extraordinary obligations by means of taxation. We can not bring home to the people of this country the necessity for economy and retrenchment and the elimination of unnecessary things merely by attempting to borrow money and passing on to posterity the burden of this war. And let me suggest that we can not go beyond a certain limit in obtaining money through the borrowing capacity of the Government unless those who are willing to advance the money are awakened to a belief that the Government is utilizing its taxing power to its utmost in order to strengthen the credit of the Government by obtaining the necessary means to pay its debts.

Even those of us who were not participants in the Civil War can remember and those who have studied the subject know that the Government was put to desperate straits to obtain money, because it had started out on the theory that it would obain its money by loans. The enormous issue of greenbacks and noninterest-bearing obligations of the Government and the short-time interest-bearing obligations of the Government were such as almost absolutely to paralyze the credit and the financial system of the United States. We ought to avoid such a situation at this time. The establishment of the Federal Reserve System and the enactment of this legislation are the two greatest safeguards for the security and prosperity of the country. I wish to add my word of commendation to the members of the Committee on Ways and Means for realizing the necessity for legislation of this character at this time; and while it may be desirable and while I shall myself vote for some changes in different places in this bill, on the whole I believe that the committee, under all existing circumstances, have accomplished their task in a manner that, if not in the immediate present, at least in the very near future will evoke the commendation of the country. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. I ask that the gentleman have one minute more. I wish to ask him a question.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Rhode Island asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from New York be extended one minute. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. Did I understand the gentleman to say that the immediate need or necessity for money was $1,600,000,000?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Upon the obligations of the Government now apparent, in addition to the $2,195,000,000 to be obtained by bonds and the existing revenue, we need $1,658,158,201.83.

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. The bill in providing for $800,000,000 takes care of the necessities of the hour.

Mr. FITZGERALD. As they are; but we know that in time of peace the total expenditures are always greater than those anticipated when the appropriations are made, and under existing circumstances enormous additional demands will undoubtedly be made before the expiration of the next fiscal year.

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say just a word as a member of the Ways and Means Committee. I thought that this was the least of the four propositions that we have voted or shall be called to vote upon for the session. First, the great declaration; second, the vote of the enormous bond issue; third, the conscripting of men; and, fourth, the conscripting of an amount of money small compared with our indebtedness, and its value infinitesimal compared with that host of humanity which you so readily ordered conscripted a few days ago.

I thought in closing this program it would be of value to the country here and elsewhere for us to present a united front in this House and that the committee which was intrusted with this great undertaking should be able individually and collectively to present a report that would be unanimous. Having presented it with such reservations as were made by the supporting Members we could come into the House here and would receive such benefits as the presumption ordinarily would be from a united report of the committee on the subject of taxation where prejudices of more than a century had been spanned between the two sides of this House. I thought perhaps the very fact that it had been agreed upon would have some weight with some Members in this House, giving some credit not to the younger members, but to the older members of the committee having thus agreed.

I went into the service of that committee in considering this bill with a few distinct ideas of what I wanted to work out. Perhaps I made myself obnoxious to some friends on either side in insisting on some propositions being adopted. They were agreed to not, probably, on account of any pressure and urgency from myself. I thought in the first instance it was due to the country that we should adopt the half-and-half policy—that is, pay one-half the war's expenses by taxation and half by bonds. We agreed that eighteen hundred million dollars should be raised by taxes. I believed we should do that for the excellent reason given yesterday on the floor of the House by the gentleman from Kentucky, Mr. SHERLEY, and again to-day by Mr. FITZGERALD, that if we should avoid a great period of disastrous inflation in this country we must see to it that our bonded indebtedness was kept as low as possible. Then for another reason that it may be that in our stress in a year or two from now we will need the credit to be conserved, strengthened, and buttressed, and not weakened by overissuance of bonds now.

But there was another reason, and that was that the bonds that are now to be issued are issued on terms of 30 years. Thirty years added to the average age of the men who are to be conscripted will make them 56 years of age. I do not believe that it is the intention of the American people—in fact, I do not think it would be wise for this Congress or the American people—to say to the boys, "You are conscripted now to fight the battles. Should you return in health or broken by wound or disease at the end of 30 years you will be compelled to pay the expense of the war." For that reason I was insistent upon the agreement that we should have an eighteen hundred million dollar basis. When men on the committee agreed with me on that proposition that did not suit them, I agreed on their proposition. I felt like living up to it here on the floor of the House. Further, I insisted that a substantial part of this eighteen hundred million dollars should be raised at our ports. I presented a plan with the protection feature emphasized, but it was not approved. I accepted the tariff section as the best that could be agreed upon. I think it is the duty of the committee to stand up for the bill as presented; crude as it is, it is as superior to anything suggested by its frantic critics as something is to nothing. I think our votes on the next paragraph or two will indicate whether or not the agreement of the members of the committee entered into in presenting this report shall be lived up to.

I know a great deal of it is distasteful to me and distasteful to others, but it seems to me that after agreeing to raise eighteen hundred million dollars, and knowing that it is going to be a burden on a great many people, and knowing that we have agreed as a committee to span the ancient differences of this Chamber, that we ought to at least give it a fair support, and say, as far as the committee is concerned, we ought to support it in accordance with our agreement to report.

I am convinced that should you see fit to return this bill to the Committee on Ways and Means, faulty though it is, you will not get a better bill. I doubt very much if there would be anything like the unanimity and agreement with which this bill was presented. [Applause.]

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. KEATING. I had read yesterday an amendment which was a substitute for this section. Shall I present it now?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has had it read for information.

Mr. MANN. Was it reported?

The CHAIRMAN. It was not reported.

Mr. KEATING. It was read in my time.

Mr. MANN. Then it is not pending.

Mr. KEATING. I offer the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 2, beginning at line 4, strike out everything down to and including line 5, on page 4, and insert the following:

"SEC. 2. That in addition to the normal tax provided for in section 1 of this act and by subdivision (A) of section 1 of the act entitled 'An act to increase the revenue, and for other purposes,' approved September 8, 1916, there shall be levied, assessed, collected, and paid in lieu of the additional tax now provided by law an additional tax upon the income of every individual received in the calendar year 1917, and every calendar year thereafter, as follows: Two per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $5,000 and does not exceed $7,500; 4 per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $7,500 and does not exceed $10,000; 8 per cent per annum upon the amount by which such total net income exceeds $10,000 but does not exceed $20,000; 13 per cent per annum upon the amount by which such total net income exceeds $20,000 but does not exceed $40,000; 18 per cent per annum upon the amount by which such total net income exceeds $40,000 but does not exceed $60,000; 28 per cent per annum upon the amount by which such total net income exceeds $60,000 but does not exceed $80,000; 38 per cent per annum upon the amount by which such total net income exceeds $80,000 but does not exceed $100,000; 48 per cent per annum upon the amount by which such total net income exceeds $100,000 but does not exceed $150,000; 96 per cent per annum upon the amount by which such total net income exceeds $150,000."

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Chairman, I take it that all the Members of this House are agreed upon one proposition, and that is that we shall pass a revenue bill which will raise at least eighteen hundred million dollars.

The only question of controversy is: How shall that money be raised?

The committee has submitted a proposition by which $900,000,000, or approximately that, is raised by tax on incomes and excess profits and the other $900,000,000 by a tax on the necessaries of life and a tax on industries. My amendment is designed to fairly and frankly place the entire burden upon incomes and excess profits.

Mr. GOOD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEATING. I can not; I have only five minutes. That is the issue which this House should face. If you go on the theory that the members of the Ways and Means Committee went on, that you should strike at every head that shows without regard to whether you hit it or not, or whether it should be hit or not, the bill now pending is as good a bill as you could bring into the House. But I submit that it is not a logical bill; it is not a scientific bill; it is not a bill that can be defended before the people of this country. That is admitted by practically every gentleman who has addressed the House. My proposal is that we shall adopt a definite principle for financing the war, the principle that the bulk of our new taxes can be and shall be levied upon excess incomes and excess profits. In other words, you should tax the men who are in a position to pay the tax. I hold in my hand a clipping from the Washington Post of May 11 last, which was printed upon the first page of every newspaper in this country, which tells us that the French Chamber of Deputies are now considering a proposition by which they will substitute an income tax for all their direct taxes.

That has been the experience of most of the countries of Europe. They have discovered, as all countries have discovered, that you can not finance wars by bond issues, and that when you place a tax upon necessaries of life, when you destroy industry through taxation you are really increasing the cost of war, and that the simple course, the equitable course, is to tax the excess incomes and the excess profits of a country. England, after fighting a war for more than two years, is now raising through such a tax practically eighteen hundred million dollars. This country has three times as much wealth as England and the income of its people is fully three times as great as the income of the English people. Why not draw on this tremendous reservoir of excess earnings for whatever money may be needed to finance this war?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Colorado has expired.

Mr. McLEMORE. Mr. Chairman, I have a substitute for the substitute, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman offers an amendment to the substitute, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by striking out all after the word "That" in the first paragraph and inserting the following:

"There shall be assessed, levied, and collected on all incomes during the present calendar year, and during each year or part of year, while the war now existing between the United States and the Imperial Government of Germany shall continue, the following rates or charges, to wit: On incomes exceeding $3,000 and not exceeding $10,000, 5 per cent; on incomes exceeding $10,000 and not exceeding $20,000, 10 per cent; on incomes exceeding $20,000 and not exceeding $30,000, 20 per cent; and on all incomes exceeding $30,000, 100 per cent."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry. Is this an amendment to the substitute?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair was just going to inquire.

Mr. McLEMORE. It is a substitute for the substitute.

The CHAIRMAN. An amendment to the substitute.

Mr. SWITZER. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. KEATING] seeks to impose a tax in this bill of 96 per cent upon large incomes. As I read the existing law, there is already imposed a tax of 15 per cent on large incomes, and I do not understand how you can collect 96 per cent more.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman has not understood my amendment. My amendment is to add 96 per cent to the normal tax.

Mr. SWITZER. I can not yield. I have only three minutes.

Mr. KEATING. I do not want the gentleman to make any such statement.

Mr. SWITZER. I propounded a question to the gentleman yesterday as to what the estimate of incomes to be collected would be under his measure, and he said about $1,600,000,000 annually. I asked as to succeeding years, and he said to the House that it would be as much in succeeding years; but it does not matter how many tax experts theorize that such an income could be collected year after year, every Member of this House knows that it can not be done, that they will go into hiding, and there would not be $1,600,000,000 collected the second, the third, or the fourth year.

But I did not rise especially for that purpose. I voted yesterday for the Lenroot amendment. I intend to vote for the other amendments that the gentleman offered here to-day, but I indicated in talking with various Members that if a sufficient revenue were collected by his proposed increase of the income tax I would vote to cut out the retroactive income tax and some other provisions of the bill. As I understand it, this tax will not begin with incomes of $5,000 or $2,000 or $3,000, and it will raise only $65,000,000 of additional income. I desire to give notice that I shall not vote to cut out the retroactive feature of the income tax. I also desire to give notice that I shall not vote to cut out the provision of 3 per cent on freight. It seems to me that that would be distributed in a way that the people will not complain of, and that a 3 per cent tax on freight bills will be borne by the people of the country with less murmur than would a cent and a half a pound excise tax on sugar. I am certain that the provision as to heat and light should be stricken out, and there should be some modification of the second-class mail matter.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Chairman, I just want to occupy the attention of the committee for a few minutes.

Volumes have been written upon different methods of raising revenue, and the discussion upon this subject by members of the Ways and Means Committee, especially during the last several days, has been most illuminating. It shall not be my purpose to delay the House by any extended remarks, but I do wish to point out a few matters that it strikes me we should bear in mind in considering the pending measure. In the first place, with the tremendous increase in the expenditures of government during war over the normal expenditures in time of peace, the problem is at once presented whether or not it is the part of wisdom for the present generation to bear a portion of the burden of financing the war; and if so, how much. I have endeavored to gather from the experiences of our own country in the past something that would be helpful in meeting the present situation. In the War of 1812 we financed our enterprise by borrowing from the future, and the result was depreciation in the money of the United States and financial distress. We did the same thing largely in the Civil War, and especially during the first few years, and the result was the same. The War with Mexico was of short duration, and while we pursued the same policy I can not doubt that we were spared from a like experience there by reason of the fact that we were not called upon to extend our credit in any unusual degree. In the War with Spain we adopted for the first time what, in my judgment, is the true policy of requiring the people of the given day to pay in large part the expenditures necessary for our military operations.

To-day there are two courses open; the one looks to throwing the responsibility of financing the war onto the future; the other looks to assuming a large part of the responsibility of financing the war by the people of to-day. If we throw the burden onto the future and increase our bonded indebtedness enormously, in my judgment two results must inevitably follow: First, if the war shall continue so that the indebtedness shall become enormously great, we can not escape the fact that the credit even of our own country will thereby depreciate. Second, by increasing the indebtedness of the country and inflating our currency we shall upset all standards by which we are accustomed to measuring the value of work and commodities, and the result will be that the purchasing power of the dollar will be enormously decreased. Both these ends are disastrous, and, Mr. Chairman, we shall prevent largely both of these results if the present day shall shoulder up under a large share of the burden that war means. In my judgment, there should be no choice, and it is our duty to be as loyal and patriotic with our pocketbooks as we are loyal and patriotic with the lives of our men who will fight our country's battles.

The next question that confronts us is, How can we raise this vast amount of money? In my judgment, we should bear in mind constantly the rule that that method of taxation is best which places the burden of government upon each in proportion to his ability to pay. We could raise all the money necessary to meet the amount proposed in the bill by the Ways and Means Committee by placing a per capita tax of $18 per head upon our people. Were such a tax constitutional, who can say that it would not be most unjust? It would be insignificant from the standpoint of the man of wealth. It would be an enormous burden from the standpoint of the poor man or the poor woman whose income is meager and whose responsibilities are great. Let us see if there can not be worked out some means that will make the people bear the burden in proportion to their ability.

Some of the methods of taxation proposed strike at income, some strike at business, some strike at a tax on such commodities that the poor bear equally with the rich the burden of taxation. The latter alone, of course, we can not tolerate. The tax on business as such, it seems to me, must be considered only with relation to profits. There are some lines of business that are unable to pass on the burden of taxation to a multitude of people and thereby let it fall easily upon the backs of all. There are some businesses that would be crushed under a tax upon the business. This method of taxation, then, must be viewed with greatest care. The proposition of taxing profits or incomes appeals to me as most just, the least burdensome, and the most wise. As long as there are profits a business is not going to the wall. As long as an individual is making an income in excess of the exemptions he is not in want, and a tax can not be a burden upon him in the degree that it must be when it prevents a profit at all or when the tax that is exacted is money that had better be spent for necessaries of life.

Mr. Chairman, I shall support, and I urge upon the House, the Lenroot amendment. I shall support this amendment because it is equitable, because it places a large share of the burden of this war upon the shoulders of those most able to bear it, and fairly, it seems to me, in proportion to that ability.

Again, the bill as it has been reported, was prepared without the committee having had the benefit of extensive hearings. From somewhat careful thought and upon facts that have been presented to me and to the other Members of this House I am led to believe that some of the paragraphs further on in the bill should be modified or stricken out. I refer to those paragraphs that tax business itself and not the profits of business, and also that impose taxes that must fall too nearly equally upon the man of unlimited wealth and the man of no financial means.

These paragraphs can be considered later on, probably next winter, after the committee shall have had extensive hearings. In the meantime let us not impose any tax that may prove inequitable. Let us not impose a tax blindly. Rather let us pass the Lenroot amendment, and to the extent that its provisions will give us revenue we may be sure the revenue thus raised will be upon profit and will in no degree place any business in jeopardy.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Chairman, yesterday I offered an amendment which unfortunately for me, as well as for the House, the Clerk did not read correctly. For that reason I am going to ask that the amendment which I offered yesterday be again reported.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. SABATH offers the following as a substitute to section 2:

"SEC. 2. That in addition to the additional tax imposed by subdivision (b) of section 1 of such act of September 8, 1916, there shall be levied, assessed, collected, and paid a like additional tax upon the income of every individual received in the calendar year 1917 and every calendar year thereafter, as follows:

"One per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $5,000 and does not exceed $7,500;

"Two per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $7,500 and does not exceed $10,000;

"Three per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $10,000 and does not exceed $12,500;

"Four per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $12,500 and does not exceed $15,000;

"Five per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $15,000 and does not exceed $20,000;

"Six per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $20,000 and does not exceed $35,000;

"Eight per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $35,000 and does not exceed $50,000;

"Eleven per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $50,000 and does not exceed $60,000;

"Fourteen per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $60,000 and does not exceed $75,000;

"Seventeen per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $75,000 and does not exceed $100,000;

"Twenty per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $100,000 and does not exceed $125,000;

"Twenty-four per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $125,000 and does not exceed $150,000;

"Twenty-seven per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $150,000 and does not exceed $175,000;

"Thirty per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $175,000 and does not exceed $200,000.

"Thirty-three per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $200,000 and does not exceed $250,000;

"Forty per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $250,000 and does not exceed $300,000;

"Forty-five per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $300,000 and does not exceed $350,000;

"Fifty per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $350,000 and does not exceed $400,000;

"Fifty-five per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $400,000 and does not exceed $450,000;

"Sixty per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $450,000 and does not exceed $500,000; and

"Sixty-six per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $500,000."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the amendment, and make a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MANN. How is that amendment offered?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understood the gentleman offered his amendment as a substitute.

Mr. SABATH. I offered it as an amendment yesterday and it was pending.

Mr. MANN. It was not offered; it was read. Now there is a substitute pending and an amendment to the substitute. The gentleman's amendment is not in order at this time.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understood that the gentleman asked that it be read. The Chair did not understand that the gentleman at this time offered the amendment. Of course, it will not be in order now.

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Chairman, inasmuch as gentlemen are anxious to get to a vote on the various amendments that are pending to this section, I shall only take a few moments to explain why I offered the substitute to the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT], and especially as I shall have occasion a little later to discuss the bill more at length. It is manifest from the action that the committee has already taken upon the amendments to the preceding paragraphs that my motion will not be adopted, but I offered it to illustrate the general plan which I think should be followed in raising this enormous war fund. There are millions of people in this country who believe that many large incomes have been greatly augmented as a result of the war in Europe, and that the desire to augment them had much to do with involving us in that war. If that be true, it is an added reason why those incomes should bear, as my motion proposes, a larger share of the financial burden of the war than this bill provides and larger than the gentleman from Wisconsin proposes. I have always believed that in times of peace, even, the burden of government should be placed as much as possible upon those able to bear it and as little as possible upon those not able to bear it. The reasons for that are accentuated by existing war conditions when men of means are receiving benefits from them, while the poor are suffering from them. This is not demagoguery. It is simple justice. I believe also that more of this money should be raised by the sale of bonds and less by taxation now, particularly that kind of taxation that will have to be paid in the end by those whose purchasing power is already so curtailed by high prices that they can scarcely purchase the necessaries of life. But I shall not go into that now. If we can not get an amendment adopted that goes further in the direction I have indicated, I shall vote for the Lenroot amendment as a step in the right direction.

Mr. MANN. What is the amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. LANGLEY: Page 3, line 13, strike out "seventeen" and insert "twenty"; page 3, line 16, after the word "twenty," insert the word "five"; page 3, line 19, strike out the word "twenty-four" and insert the word "thirty"; page 3, line 22, strike out the word "twenty-seven" and insert the word "forty"; page 4, line 1, strike out the word "thirty" and insert the word "fifty"; page 4, line 4, strike out the word "thirty-three" and insert the word "seventy-five."

The CHAIRMAN. Does the Chair understand the gentleman from Kentucky offers this as a substitute?

Mr. LANGLEY. As a substitute to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The next amendment is that offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT].

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessess. Is the Chair certain that is correct? My impression is that the question will be on the substitute for the amendment first.

Mr. MANN. No; the substitute is not to the Lenroot amendment but is to the section.

The CHAIRMAN. There is a substitute offered to the section, and the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. KEATING] offered an amendment to the substitute, which is pending. The question now is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Chairman, may we have the amendment reported? It is just a line or two.

Mr. LANGLEY. Regular order!

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Chairman, half of us do not know what the amendment is.

SEVERAL MEMBERS. Regular order!

The CHAIRMAN. The regular order is demanded.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced the noes seemed to have it.

On a division (demanded by Mr. LENROOT) there were—ayes 123, noes 99.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Chairman, let us have tellers.

Tellers were ordered.

The committee again divided; and the tellers (Mr. GARNER and Mr. LENROOT) reported that there were—ayes 146, noes 107.

So the amendment was agreed to. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The next amendment is that offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. EMERSON].

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. EMERSON: Page 3, line 13, strike out lines 13, 14, and 15 and insert in lieu thereof the following: "Fifty per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $100,000 but does not exceed $200,000."

Page 3, line 16, strike out lines 16, 17, and 18 and insert in lieu thereof the following: "Sixty per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $200,000 but does not exceed $300,000."

Page 3, line 19, strike out lines 19, 20, 21, 22, 23, and 24 and page 4, lines 1, 2, 3, 4, and 5 and insert in lieu thereof the following: "Seventy-five per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $300,000."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order the amendment is not in order, although I am not sure. The committee has just agreed to an amendment fixing the rates. Now, this is offered practically as an amendment to that amendment. The other amendment has been agreed to. I think it is too late.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state this as the situation: Unanimous consent was given to vote upon all the amendments at one time.

Mr. MANN. Well, if the Chair holds this is an amendment pending I have nothing further to say. I have no objection to voting on it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair begs to explain that is the situation, and for that reason the amendment possibly ought to have been voted on before.

Mr. MANN. I withdraw the point of order.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. PAIGE] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. PAIGE: Page 4, line 5, after the figures "500,000," insert "that 65 per cent of the salaries of Members of Congress be turned over to the Secretary of the Treasury during the war with Germany."

[Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. BUTLER. Division, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HOWARD. Is this proposition debatable?

The CHAIRMAN. It is not.

The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. PAIGE], and division has been demanded.

Mr. CANNON. Who offered the amendment?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, may the amendment be again read? Some gentlemen did not understand it.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will be again read.

The amendment was again reported.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HEFLIN. The author of this amendment, I understand, is a millionaire.

The CHAIRMAN. That is not a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. HEFLIN. It ought to be.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 42, noes 147.

So the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the amendment to the substitute, offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MCLEMORE].

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Chairman, I want to know what it is. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

The CHAIRMAN. Regular order is demanded.

The question was taken, and the amendment to the substitute was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is now upon the substitute offered by the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. KEATING].

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. KEATING. Division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 26, noes 145.

So the substitute was rejected.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, my colleague [Mr. MASON] yesterday gave notice that he would offer an amendment, and was allotted time for that purpose. It was not at the appropriate place. He is unavoidably out of the House to-day, and I ask unanimous consent that it may be in order hereafter for him to offer an amendment at the end of section 2.

Mr. KITCHIN. I have no objection to that.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] asks unanimous consent that his colleague, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MASON] be permitted to offer an amendment at the end of section 2.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I want to reserve all points of order on it.

Mr. MANN. Of course it would be subject to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment as a new section.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 4, after line 5, insert as a new section:

"SEC. 3. That on and after January 1, 1918, individuals, withholding agents, corporations, joint-stock companies, or associations, and insurance companies liable for income, munitions, or excess-profits taxes, shall pay, without levy, assessment, or notice, simultaneously with the submission of their return of tax, and not later than the last day allowed by law for the submission of such return, the amount of tax for which they are shown by such returns to be liable. If any tax is not paid at the time when it is due under the provisions of this section, there shall be added the sum of 5 per cent to the amount of tax unpaid and interest at the rate of 1 per cent per month upon said tax from the time it became due.

"Collectors of internal revenue are authorized to receive uncertified checks in payment of income, munitions, and excess-profits taxes during such time and under such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury shall prescribe; but if a check so received shall not be paid by the bank on which it is drawn, the person in payment of whose taxes such check shall have been tendered shall remain liable for the tax and for all legal penalties and additions the same as if such check had not been tendered."

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I am in hopes that the committee will accept this amendment, so that if it needs to be perfected it can be done after consideration. The purpose of the amendment——

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Certainly.

Mr. GARNER. This bill as it is drawn purports not to repeal any of the laws on the books in reference to income, and I doubt whether the gentleman's amendment would reach the taxes that are levied under the old law; and if it would not, it ought to be arranged so that all these taxes be paid at the same time.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I said it may be that upon the examination the committee will desire to modify it in some form. Under the law at present individuals and corporations subject to income tax, munition taxes, or excessive profits taxes first make out a return. The computation of the amount of the tax is a simple matter. The return is mailed to the collectors of internal revenue in various districts. A force of clerks take those returns and put upon the tax bill the amount of tax due as found from the return. Those bills are then mailed to the persons who made out the returns and they then mail their checks in payment. Subsequently another force of clerks is employed to check up to ascertain whether the check corresponds with the bills, and subsequently a third force is put to work to audit the various returns that have been made. It has been estimated that about $500,000 annually can be saved in clerical services if the persons required to make returns be required at the same time to mail a check in payment of the amount of tax the return shows is due.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. Does the gentleman think it is more burdensome to pay $500,000 for mailing and compiling and auditing than it would be to compel the man to send his check with his return on the day he made the return, when, in fact, it might well be that the man would not have the money against which to draw a check at the time?

Mr. FITZGERALD. That may be his misfortune two months later when he has to pay it, anyway. His return now must be made by the 1st of March, and under the law he has until the 1st of June to pay the tax without penalty. This simply requires him to pay his tax when he makes out his returns. I do not believe there is any particular burden placed upon the individual by the proposal.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for another question? I want to ask it for information.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. The gentleman stated that the individual makes the return and extends the amount of the tax. I do not believe that it is possible for an individual in 9 cases out of 10 to figure out what the amount of the tax is under the forms that are submitted by the Treasury Department. I have never been able to figure it out, and I know something about business methods.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman then could turn it over to some clerk in his office and he would have no trouble. Any man who can figure out the sum upon which the tax is due will have no trouble at all in determining how much the tax is, and I have not found anybody subject to the tax who, after his return was compiled, did not know exactly how much the tax would be. But we have this cumbersome, antiquated system, which would not exist in any place except in some bureau of the United States Government, where three times these returns are unnecessarily gone over, whereas with a system such as this, when the check is received one audit, one examination by the clerk, would ascertain whether the check for the amount was correct, whether the sum stated is the proper one, and whether the return is final.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the gentleman's time be extended five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, the reason I make the statement that perhaps this amendment may need modification is that the next section provides that the taxes imposed by sections 1 and 2 shall be computed, levied, assessed, collected, and paid upon the same basis and in the same manner as similar taxes imposed by section 1 of the previous law, and it may be that in the working out of the system it will be necessary to make some modification of this plan. But that it is the sensible, businesslike plan no one can doubt.

We were asked at the last session of Congress to give the Secretary of the Treasury $3,000,000 to employ men to audit returns after they had been filed and examined and the bills made out and the money sent in payment of the tax. If, when the return is mailed by the person liable to the tax, he mails at the same time a check for the amount which the return would show was due, then one examination would be sufficient in place of three.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. I will say to the gentleman that if the basis of the efficiency committee was correct as to the present law, under the new law the number of renditions taken in would be 4,000,000. You can imagine the amount of clerk hire that would be required for that.

Mr. FITZGERALD. If there will be 4,000,000 renditions under the new law, my recollection is that somewhere under 300,000 persons are now subject to an income-tax return, and we will hardly be able to house the number of persons that would be required to examine, bill, and audit all these returns.

There is another phase of it. It is true that this system will advance the payment of the tax by two or three months; and based upon the estimated amount to be received from these various taxes it will amount to a sum equivalent to about $12,000,000 in interest annually for the use of that money at 3½ per cent. The Bureau of Internal Revenue has unexpectedly and suddenly had cast upon it a tremendous volume of business, an enormous amount of work not contemplated. It has not been, and is not now, organized properly to transact the business devolved upon it, and this is one suggestion made by the Bureau of Efficiency, directed by Congress to make an investigation and determine what reforms could be accomplished. That investigation, based upon the old law itself, without considering these new laws, indicates the saving of at least $500,000. I hope the amendment will be adopted and perfected, and that the system will be put into effect.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Does not the gentleman think his penalty is rather harsh? Does not the gentleman think that 1 or 2 per cent would be more nearly in keeping with the cost of collection?

Mr. FITZGERALD. No. In order to have taxes paid promptly the rule in all cases of taxation is that the penalty must be sufficiently severe to compel the prompt payment of taxes, otherwise the tax will not be paid promptly, for the person subject to the payment of the tax would prefer to make a belated payment of the tax with the added interest, while a penalty of 1 per cent a month would undoubtedly compel prompt compliance with the law.

Mr. KREIDER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. KREIDER. I would like to ask the gentleman from New York whether it is not a fact that in the forms now sent out to be filled in there is a printed request that the amount of the tax be not extended?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes; but the fact that that is in there makes no difference. That is because it is desired to give some clerk an opportunity to do a merely clerical act that the person who figures out the amount of money on which the tax is to be computed can very readily do himself.

Mr. KREIDER. I want to suggest to the gentleman that there is possibly another reason, and that is that there is possibly a chance for an error to creep in. The chances are that the clerk, familiar with figures, will get it correct, and then they are required to render a statement to the party who has to pay the tax. If you are going to send out the statement requesting every individual to make the extension and inclosing a check for the amount of the tax, I venture to say there will be more extra clerical work necessitated by trying to straighten out clerical errors than would be saved by adopting this other method.

Mr. FITZGERALD. That is the gentleman's opinion. I am basing this statement on the examination and on the conclusion drawn from the examination of what has been done. I do not believe there is any particular difficulty involved for a person after he has determined the sum subject to tax to make a very simple computation as to the amount of the tax under the provisions of the law. I hope the amendment will be accepted by the committee, so that it can be perfected and its provisions put into effect.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I notice it is stated in the paper that blanks for returns will not be sent out to those people who are not liable for the $1,000 or the $2,000 income tax. I should like to know whether or not it is the policy of the department to allow the person who is to pay the tax to judge for himself whether his income is $2,000 or $1,000?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I can not speak for the department.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. KITCHIN. I should like to have the gentleman's time extended two minutes, to make a suggestion.

Mr. MANN. I should like to speak on this first.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois is recognized.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I hope this amendment, or some amendment in its nature, will be agreed to. There is absolutely no legitimate excuse for the amount of red tape in use under the Government. Here are these income returns. A man has to figure up practically the amount of his income tax. He has to make a return of the amount of the income. The tax is on a mere percentage basis. If his income return is correct, when he figures the amount of his income a boy 9 years old can figure the amount of the tax. Of course, there are thousands of cases where the amount of the income is incorrectly figured. Those can be corrected in the Treasury Department under either method. As it is now the Treasury Department has to correct the incorrect returns of the amount of the income and then has to approve the correct returns of the amount of the income and send the bill to everybody. Under the amendment of the gentleman from New York, when the income return is made and the check is presented with it, the Treasury Department will correct any incorrect income returns and notify the person who makes those returns. But the large percentage of the returns are correct, and those correct returns each year have to be gone over again after they have been audited by the Treasury Department. Like some of the other gentlemen here, I make out an income-tax return. I would be perfectly willing to pay my tax in February. It would be a great deal less of a nuisance to me, situated as I am, like many others, to pay the tax then than to wait till I get the return from the Treasury Department. Now, I do not know whether the notices have been sent out yet. I do not know whether I would receive my notice or not. Notice would be sent to some address where I am supposed to live in Chicago.

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman yield for a suggestion?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. In talking over the question of making these returns, this identical question, in the Ways and Means Committee, I suggested that that was the policy pursued in making my returns. The gentleman's colleague from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY] said he followed the same idea, having heard my suggestion, and that the collector in Illinois sent his check back to him and said he could not receive it. I said I would like the collector of taxes in my district to send my check back just once, to see what kind of a letter he would get.

Mr. MANN. He probably thought the gentleman's check was a good check, and would not send it back. [Laughter.] Now, as a matter of fact, they have in the Treasury Department a division that goes over all these claims for adjustments. There are many claims for adjustments. I went up to the Treasury Department at one time and sat down with the chief of that department and a number of his employees, and as a matter of curiosity went over a lot of the adjustments, and I found they were spending hours—I would not say days—in adjusting claims of less than 18 cents. That is a useless piece of red tape. However, I would like to suggest to the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] that where a man or a corporation makes a return and sends a check with the return, and on auditing in the Treasury Department it is found that the check is not large enough, but that the payment has been made in good faith, no undue penalty should attach. I think the gentleman said the penalty was 5 per cent, and 1 per cent a month. I do not know whether he meant both, but it ought not to be 5 per cent when the money was paid in good faith. There ought to be no undue penalty on that.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I have just noted in the report of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue a section which it seems to me bears directly on this matter, and ought to give us reason to pause before action. This seems at first blush to be a valuable reform. Perhaps the purpose is correct, but it may work a tremendous hardship upon a host of American citizens. In the last report of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue I find this statement:

> An analysis of the situation has shown that further tax was due the Government in 63 per cent of the number of returns designated for investigation, and that an average of $200 resulted from each examination. Coincident with the examination of returns in hand there has been pursued a diligent search for delinquents, and investigations of this character have resulted in securing returns in 52 per cent of the cases initiated, with an average yield of $30 tax.

It is proposed in this bill to increase the number of income-tax payers by the million. These persons have not been familiar with making out income-tax reports. Mistakes are bound to creep in, and a heavy penalty is to be laid upon those who make mistakes——

Mr. GARNER. If the gentleman will allow me, I think he has confused the idea of those who do not return all the income that they should have returned to the Government, rather than the technical point he speaks of.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. No; the bureau after investigation finds that errors are made, and has to go over all reports. Now, no clerical hire is going to be saved when the proposition is considered that every return must be duly authenticated. The report of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue further shows that it is vastly important to scan carefully the reports in order to determine that the original sums upon which the percentages are figured are correct. I read from the report:

> The problem of income-tax collections resolves itself into a matter of locating the individuals who have taxable incomes and of ascertaining the taxable amounts; and it is of more than ordinary interest to observe that the actual experience of the Government in the collection of internal taxes and customs duties has demonstrated the necessity of securing information that will enable it to determine for itself whether or not a taxpayer's declaration is true, and by this means to assert and collect the full amount of tax where evasion has been attempted.

That is part of the proposition here involved, and should be considered. These amounts as now reported are found difficult to ascertain exactly, and I submit to you that it is going to be a severe hardship to have 5 per cent added and 1 per cent a month added to 2,000,000 new taxpayers who are entirely unfamiliar with income-tax calculations.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. All members of the Committee on Appropriations are familiar with the circumstances where persons making returns, particularly corporations, have not complied with the law. That condition will remain, whatever the method of payment is.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. The gentleman misunderstands my position. All these returns must be considered and examined by clerks, and if it is found that errors creep in it will make it necessary to investigate every such case.

Mr. STAFFORD. The cases instanced by the commissioner in the report are where returns have been gone over and by reason of erroneous bookkeeping methods or intentional misrepresentations they have ferreted out millions of dollars owing to the Government.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. My point is that all these must be gone over by clerks.

Mr. STAFFORD. If they are defective and defrauding the Government.

Mr. BARNHART. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. BARNHART. The remarks of the gentleman from Pennsylvania do not remove the abuse referred to in the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York. These reports have to be gone over now, but the amendment of the gentleman from New York will remove the necessity of going into duplication, making duplicate reports and making returns.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. It seems to me that the duplicate reports are to be made anyway, and you penalize the small taxpayers, who are unfamiliar with income-tax calculations, and they will be subjected to so much more hardship.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. That is the present penalty under existing law, of 5 per cent if not paid when due.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. The gentleman knows that this makes the taxpayer himself figure the amount and send in a check.

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes; the amount that he finds due the Government.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. And that gives an opportunity for still more mistakes. We should not act hastily on this matter without knowing its full scope.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to pass this over and take it up to-morrow morning, because if it is going to be amended it should make a new section and be put in after section 5 as section 6.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. SAUNDERS). The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York may be passed over, to be taken up in the morning. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 4. That in addition to the tax imposed by section 10 of such act of September 8, 1916, there shall be levied, assessed, collected, and paid a like tax of 2 per cent upon the income received in the calendar year 1917 and every calendar year thereafter, by every corporation, joint-stock company or association, or insurance company, subject to the tax imposed by that section, except that if it has fixed its own fiscal year, the tax imposed by this section shall be levied, assessed, collected, and paid only on that portion of its income for the fiscal year ending during the calendar year 1917 which the period between January 1, 1917, and the end of such fiscal year bears to the whole of such fiscal year.

The tax imposed by this section shall be computed, levied, assessed, collected, and paid upon the same incomes and in the same manner as the tax imposed by section 10 of such act of September 8, 1916.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 4, line 11, strike out lines 11, 12, 13, 14, 15, 16, 17, and 18 except "the pro-," and strike out lines 25, 24, and all of 23 after "and eighteen."

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, the effect of this proposition is to eliminate the incomes of $1,000 and $2,000 from the effect of this bill. This is offered purely in a spirit of business equity. For a little bit be kind enough to follow me and I will explain the theory upon which this amendment is presented. If you will turn to page 11 of the report, you will find that there are 12 divisions of this income to be derived by the Government from this bill. Of these the first two, you will find, draw the money from the large fund of wealth in this country. The others are all paid practically by men of incomes under $3,000. For that reason, purely as a business proposition, as a matter of equity, I think they have paid enough, and there is no reason why they should be assessed upon their incomes.

You take Title III, and that is a tax upon liquor of various kinds. Ninety-nine per cent of the people of this country take 99 per cent of the drinks and pay 99 per cent of that tax. The rich man's share is negligible in the sum total. When they pay 99 per cent of that tax you pass on to the next one—cigars and tobacco—and you find that 99 per cent of that tax is paid by the people whose incomes are of the class mentioned. Then under Title V you have freight. An immense majority of the receipts of freight will be from people with small incomes or will finally be passed on to them. Express, passenger tickets, seats, and berth taxes are mainly paid by them, and the gas and most of the telephone service will be contributed by them. Of telephone and telegraph messages, a large majority will be paid by these people. Take Title VI, as to the automobile. That is more or less divided, and the rich man's tax will run a little higher. But take the musical instruments, phonographs, records, motion pictures, any tax of that kind is paid by the people of that class almost unaided. Jewelry will be divided, but the tax on sporting goods, perfumes, cosmetics—and poor as they are they use them—will be paid by this class. Those with the large incomes will never know there are such taxes. Said the mosquito to the palm tree, in the Egyptian tale, "Do I weigh you down?" Said the palm tree, "If you had not spoken, I would not know you were there."

To illustrate, here is a million-dollar tax on chewing gum that will mostly come out of these people with incomes under $3,000, for nobody worth a million dollars ever takes a chew of gum. [Laughter.] Consider admission to theaters—these fellows will pay practically all of that tax. Club dues will probably come from the other fellow. The war estate tax will be paid by the rich, amounting to six millions, and I think they can stand that without much privation. The $70,000,000 additional postage falls principally on one of the comforts of average people as a direct tax. A third of the money raised by this bill will be paid by men of large incomes, or sufficient ones. Ninety per cent of $1,200,000,000 is assessed against those who part with every dollar with anxiety for the future.

Gentlemen, when you have gone through the revenue bill and laid two-thirds of it on the people with small incomes, why do you not go off and let them alone and get the rest out of the people who can afford to pay it? Why do you keep your hand on the poor man's pocket all the time. Taxes should be levied on wealth, not on people; people make soldiers. This is not an appeal to your sentiment, it is a pure business proposition. If you look at the bill you will see that they pay two-thirds of the revenue without the income tax, and now you want to fix the income tax upon them.

I heard some one say that a tax of $20 on a $2,000 income did not amount to much. Yes, it does. He has to pay the tax on everything that he has and on pretty near everything that he does, and then you want him to pay a tax on his income. Why do you stick him in here? I can not see any reason, sense, or justice in it. Everything has mounted in price except the average man's income. He has troubles of his own without rubbing Aladdin's lamp for you. He has paid all that he ought, and why do you not let him go in peace? Why assess these people on every item of their daily routine? Their total income tax is a small affair and does not amount to much, comparatively, anyway, and I suggest that it is about time to give them a little rest. The class that fights a war should not be expected to finance the war. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kansas.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. BURNETT: On page 4, line 5, after "$500,000" insert:

"That 50 per cent of the salaries of Members of Congress who voted for the resolution declaring war shall be withheld by the Secretary of the Treasury during the war with Germany and covered into the Treasury, to be used in conducting the war."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, would it be in order to modify the amendment to have the money apply on the construction of an asylum for gentlemen who offer such amendments?

Mr. BURNETT. I hope so, because I would then have the good company of the gentleman from Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I hope no man who voted for that resolution will make the point of order.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment.

The question was taken.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a division upon that.

Mr. KITCHIN. Oh, no.

Mr. MANN. Oh, yes; let us know how far we are going with this foolishness.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 1, noes 99.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. CURRY of California. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 4, line 14, strike out "$1,000 and $2,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$2,000 and $3,000," and on line 17 strike out "$1,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$2,000."

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The amendment in substance is the same as that which has just been voted down, offered by the gentleman from Kansas.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair did not follow the order of the amendment so as to be able to say offhand whether this is the same amendment or not.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The motion of the gentleman from Kansas was to strike out all of the provisions which provide for an exemption and leave the law as it is now, and this is substantially the same.

Mr. MANN. Oh, no; this changes the amount.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I did not so understand. Very well.

Mr. CURRY of California. Mr. Chairman, the best speech, I think, that was made on patriotism and universal obligation upon the floor of this House since this extra session of Congress began was made yesterday by the gentleman from Michigan, Mr. FORDNEY. There are no classes in the United States, and any man who tries to divide our people along class lines, particularly at the present time, is almost a traitor to the fundamental principles of our American institutions. [Applause.] We are all Americans in heart, and mind, and thought, and soul, and in deed. The poor man of to-day may be the rich man of to-morrow, and the rich man's son who inherits a fortune, unless he also inherits intellect and ability, may and probably will lose his patrimony, so that there is no such thing as class in this country. In this war the rich and the poor will shed their blood under the Stars and Stripes, and the rich and the poor will pay taxes, and they ought to; but the poor man's indirect taxes under the provisions of this bill are proportionately as great as are the direct taxes levied on those who enjoy large incomes. The people should pay taxes according to their ability to pay and not along class lines. The exemption of $1,000 for a single man and $2,000 for a married man would be just were it not for the extraordinary high cost of the necessaries of life. At the present time flour is $20 a barrel and bread is 10 cents a loaf, butter is 50 cents a pound, beans are 15 cents a pound, potatoes 8 cents a pound, onions 13 cents a pound, and cabbage 18 cents a pound, and ham, bacon, and beef are luxuries. The cost of the necessaries of life are extraordinarily high and will remain so during the balance of this war.

I know a man employed in the Capitol Building who makes twelve hundred dollars a year who said a couple of days ago that for one month he had not had an egg or any butter in his house because he could not afford to buy them. He has a family of five, of whom three are children going to school. I have not offered this amendment as a demagogic proposition, as a proposition to appeal to the passions and prejudices of poor people, but simply as a matter of equity and justice. Yesterday it was stated that the lowering of the exemption to $1,000 on a single man and to $2,000 on a married man would probably bring into the Treasury $100,000,000. If the exemption on a single man is raised to $2,000 and on a married man to $3,000, it will probably reduce that amount by from twenty-five to forty million dollars a year, which we can stand very readily, having automatically gradually increased the tax on the larger incomes. As a matter of justice and as a matter of right to these poor people, I think that this amendment should be adopted. As written in the bill at the present time, the lowering of the exemption to $1,000 on single men and to $2,000 on married men will tax nearly every mechanic, every clerk, every small-business man, every small farmer, and every struggling young professional man in the United States. All ought to pay who can, but I think that in justice and equity my amendment ought to be adopted.

During the war every American man and woman will be called upon to and will willingly make sacrifices. They will give of their money freely and their life's blood and the lives of those dear to them when necessary. My only son, C. F. Curry, jr., quit his studies in the university where he would have graduated in law next month to go to the Presidio in San Francisco, where he is now attending the Officers' Reserve training camp. The sons of Speaker CLARK, Mr. FORDNEY, Mr. SHALLENBERGER, Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado, and probably the sons of other Members are serving with the colors. Rich and poor will shed their blood and contribute the sinews of war willingly, but there is no present reason to tax the poor beyond their ability to pay, and to compel them to make a sacrifice that the financial conditions of the country do not warrant.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California has expired.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman, I sincerely hope that the amendment will not be adopted and that the exemption will not be changed. In the Civil War I paid a tax on $600, having then a salary of $1,200. We have raised this to $1,000 for a single man and $2,000 for a married man. The highest exemption that I know of to-day is in Great Britain, and it is $650, with $125 allowance, as I am informed, for each child, and nothing for the married man. If this were a time of peace, and if we were fixing this as a basis for the current expenses of the Government, it would be entirely different, but we are fixing it as a war measure. We have practically voted for universal service and that necessarily means universal taxation or universal assistance in the way of contributing to the expenses of the Government. Both the millionaire and the poor man are subject to conscription, both are subject to rendering their personal service to the Government as well. Each pays in proportion to his ability in addition to his service. I understood the gentleman to say that this brings a hundred million dollars additional to this bill. If you change it, it takes one hundred millions away from the bill. I hope the exemption will stand just as it is—one thousand and two thousand.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HILL. I will.

Mr. FESS. Reverting to the English system, what is the rate of taxation on the incomes that begin with $650?

Mr. HILL. Twelve per cent, and this is 2 per cent.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I just want a minute.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I do not want to take the gentleman from Ohio off the floor, but I would like to make this suggestion to the Chair if he will permit: The committee is all on one side and I do not think the rule applies to a member of the committee being entitled to recognition ahead of everybody else.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair tries to distribute recognition so that both sides to the controversy will be recognized.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I only want to say a word——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Before the gentleman passes from that point, if he will permit me to say this: An attack having been made upon the bill of the Committee on Ways and Means, should not a member of the committee be recognized to reply?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Well, I am going to say two words, then. I join with my colleague, the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL] in the hope, the very great hope, that this amendment will not be adopted. It is anticipated, gentlemen, that about 4,000,000 people would pay the tax provided in this bill. Now, that is only 4 per cent of the population of the United States. Only 370,000 people to-day pay the tax with the $3,000 and $4,000 exemptions. That is less than one-third of 1 per cent of the population of the United States. We have this morning passed amendments which multiply the taxes on the higher incomes by as much as five, raising it 500 per cent over the present income tax. Is it fair that one-third of 1 per cent, or 1 per cent as probably would be the case if the amendment of the gentleman from California is adopted, should be called upon to pay the main part of these war expenses? Gentlemen have asked what the exemptions were in other countries. The highest exemption in the world to-day, so far as I know, is in England where it is $650. In Germany the exemption is between $400 and $500, in most of the Cantons of Switzerland it is $50; in Australia and other Republics the exemptions run along about $100. In Japan it is less than $100—I think $80—but I can not claim exact accuracy on these figures when I have to give them offhand. So that even if we keep it at a thousand dollars, gentlemen, that will be nearly twice as high as the exemption in any other country under the sun. I think it would be in the highest degree unfair; it would be unwise public policy if we shall undertake to collect the greater amount of this bill by an income tax and not allow a reasonable number of people to pay it. There is not a man in this country in my opinion who has an income of $2,000 to-day who would object to paying $20, and that is all he would have to pay with our present exemption, for his share of this war. Gentlemen, you will entirely defeat the balance of the whole scheme of taxation as provided in this bill if you increase by any amount the exemptions of a thousand and two thousand as we have them now.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, I long hesitate to set up my judgment against the members of the committee, but if the committee has the facts it is proposed to take a hundred million dollars out of a special class in this country, the men and women working for small salaries and the men and women who are least able to bear the burden——

Mr. LONGWORTH. If the gentleman will permit, it does not amount to nearly as much as that.

Mr. FERRIS. That is the gentleman's statement. How much does this lowering of exemption yield?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will the gentleman from North Carolina state how much it is estimated with the reduction?

Mr. KITCHIN. Twenty-seven million dollars.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Twenty-seven million dollars. That is the total reduction provided by this bill from the present exemption, only $27,000,000.

Mr. FERRIS. The statement was made in debate two or three times, but at any rate——

Mr. HILL. I made the statement from a remark the gentleman from California made on the floor, but he said in conversation that he did not wish to be so understood, and he thinks it would take about $50,000,000.

Mr. FERRIS. Whether it is twenty-seven million or fifty million or eighty-seven million or a hundred million, there seems to be quite a controversy about the exact amount, it is too much to take out of these poorly paid clerks.

Mr. KITCHIN. There is no controversy.

Mr. FERRIS. How much is it? No one seems to know. Either set of figures will serve to prove all I am contending for.

Mr. KITCHIN. Twenty-seven million. That is based upon the most reliable information of experts we can get.

Mr. FERRIS. The report says eighty-five million.

Mr. KITCHIN. It does not say that.

Mr. LENROOT. That is in Mr. FORDNEY's speech.

Mr. FERRIS. All right. We will take that——

Mr. KITCHIN. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY] was mistaken.

Mr. FERRIS. We will adopt the statement of the chairman of the committee, who says it will take $27,000,000. I do not know whether it was correct or not.

Mr. CURRY of California. It was based on the statement of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH] yesterday that these exemptions down to $1,000 and $2,000 would bring into the Treasury $100,000,000. The raising of these exemptions of $2,000 on single men and $3,000 on married men probably would reduce the amount from $25,000,000 to $50,000,000.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I made no such statement.

Mr. CURRY of California. I stated that the lower exemption would make about $25,000,000 to $50,000,000 more.

Mr. FERRIS. If we do nothing else perhaps we can at least find out how much money we are actually taking from them in taxes. That will aid the House some in arriving at an intelligent conclusion. But be that as it may, it takes a very large amount of money from a class of people that can ill afford to pay it. Twenty years ago, when I was working for a similar salary, we bought shoes for $2.50 a pair when now we pay $7 for them. Twenty years ago we bought a good suit of clothes for $12, when now we pay $35 to $75. Twenty years ago, when I worked for a salary of that sort, you could clothe yourself and feed yourself for one-third of what you can do it now. I tell you that the heaping of an income tax on these small-salaried people will bring hardships that will make every one of us ashamed of ourselves. It ought not to be done. I know the Ways and Means Committee had to comb the whole Republic to get enough with which to run this war and will have to comb it again, and possibly you will have to include these cheap clerks and take away from them the last penny they have later on, to carry on this war, but let us not do that in the initial bill.

The first thing we did was to conscript 10,000,000 of our boys. I call attention to the fact that a good many of those 10,000,000 boys, a large percentage of them, are working for $75 a month to $1,000 and $1,500 a year. Our own secretaries work for $1,500 a year, and we propose to tax them, most of them, and I am not in favor of it.

These small-salaried people ought not to pay for this war.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, according to the statement that was made by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY] on the data obtained from the Treasury Department this lowering of the exemption as proposed by the bill would amount to $85,000,000. That is based upon a reduction in the amount of the exemptions from four to two thousand and from three to one thousand. This amendment, if adopted, would increase the exemption so that the reduction would be from four to three thousand and from three to two thousand. Presumably that would cut that $85,000,000 in two, so that it would mean a reduction of about $42,000,000.

Mr. FORDNEY. I wish to state to the gentleman that I made that statement, and it is based on this fact: If the lowering of that exemption brings in 4,000,000 people to pay this tax that do not now pay it, it will amount to $20 each, which is $80,000,000, is it not?

Mr. KITCHIN. They might not all pay it.

Mr. TOWNER. In any event, the amount that will be received by thus lowering the exemptions is not, in my judgment, sufficient to warrant the reductions contemplated in this bill. It will amount, if gentlemen are correct that the burden will be light, to a very small amount of money, hardly enough to pay for the cost of the collection of it. With three or four dollars from an individual and the necessity of going through his accounts and calculating them, it will not pay for the inquisitorial power that will be used to force these men into the taxing class.

I want gentlemen who are voting upon this proposition to remember that this war will or will not be popular in the extent to which it lays burdens on the common people of the country. You could do nothing, in my judgment, that would be so heavy an imposition, that would be so seriously resented, as to go into every home in this land, as it would practically mean if you reduce the exemptions to where they are in the bill, with a tax collector forcing nearly all the people to make a report. Every man who receives more than $1,000 a year will be required to make a report under oath. He will be required to account for every dollar he receives; for all increases made to his property, as well as for his cash received. It would mean that the small farmer would have to account for every pig and calf that he sold; that his wife would have to account for every dozen of eggs and pound of butter she traded at the grocery store. It would mean that every man who receives a fair salary would have to pay an income tax. All through this bill taxes are imposed which will finally rest on the small consumer. Already thus heavily burdened, this added burden will come as a crushing weight. The American citizen pays in the aggregate a heavy burden of local taxes. He is taxed to build roads, to support schools, to carry on the most expensive governmental system on earth. The Englishman is not thus taxed. If his income tax is heavy, his local tax is light. With these contemplated war taxes the American citizen will be taxed more than any other citizen in the world. It is proposed to have our current taxes to carry 50 per cent or more of the cost of the war. In Great Britain current taxes are only 26 per cent of the total. To carry the heavy burden of local and State, and ordinary taxes and then this great additional burden of war taxes is loading our people too heavily. I am in favor of the Curry amendment because it will materially lessen the burden to the people who most need the exemption.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from California [Mr. CURRY].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York offers an amendment to the amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. LAGUARDIA to the amendment offered by Mr. CURRY of California: Page 4 line 14, after the word "respectively," strike out "$1,000" and "$2,000" and insert in place thereof "$1,500" and "$2,500"; and, on line 17, strike out "$1,000" and insert in place thereof "$1,500."

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore a message from the Senate, by Mr. Waldorf, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments to the bill (H. R. 3545) to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bill of the following title:

H. R. 2343. An act granting consent to Ernest B. Denison, A. J. Barchfield, and Ethan I. Dobbs to construct a bridge across the Wabash River within or near the city limits of the city of Vincennes, Ind.

THE REVENUE BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I do not quite agree with the reasons stated by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER] that a certain class of people will resent the inquisition coupled with the making of the necessary tax returns. I base the reason for my proposed amendment solely on the ability to pay.

If you will but stop to reason for a moment you will see that we have a vast number of men and women in this country in the $1,000 and $1,200 class. Now, then, if we were only imposing an income tax, it would be fair to go even lower than the $1,000 exemption; but under this bill we are taxing the necessities of life to an extent unheard of in this country. We tax the man's light and heat, his tobacco, his insurance, his beer or soda, his amusements, his club dues, and whatnot; and if you take the proportion that the $1,200 man will pay of these extra taxes and compare it with the proportion of the same taxes that will be paid by a single man earning $2,500 you will see that the $1,000 or $1,200 man has already paid his share.

A MEMBER. On tea and coffee, for example.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes; on tea and coffee. You must take the amount that each person pays and get the proportion that that amount bears to his total earnings, and if you will do that you will see that it will be fair and just to exempt a single man $1,500 and a married man $2,500.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes.

Mr. HASTINGS. Why not leave this tax in there, and strike out the other provisions when you come to them elsewhere in the bill?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Because we have just had a vote on that.

Mr. HASTINGS. I mean these other items.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Judging from the temper and attitude of the House, I do not see much hope in that.

Gentlemen, I seriously urge the adoption of my amendment exempting the single man $1,500 and the married man $2,000. They will pay their just share through the other taxes in this bill.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have two or three minutes. I want to say to the gentlemen of the House, in reference to this exemption, that I think I am right in the figures I inserted in the RECORD. The exemption provided for in this bill is $1,000 on single persons, whereas under the existing law it is $3,000. The exemption has been lowered $2,000. The average income is the basis of figuring, and is divided halfway between the higher and lower exemption, and in this way the tax would be $20 a person. That is a pretty fair way of averaging the income of people with lower salaries or incomes, and $20 per person on 4,000,000 people would amount to a tax of $80,000,000.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. BARKLEY. Does not the gentleman know that there are many millions of people whose salaries are only $2,200, and that if married they would pay on only $200, which would be $4, instead of $20, as he has figured?

Mr. FORDNEY. The gentleman means married or single people?

Mr. BARKLEY. If he is a single man, he would pay $24, and if he is a married man he would pay only $4.

Mr. FORDNEY. If he is single, he would pay how much?

Mr. BARKLEY. If his income is $1,200, he would pay an income tax on the difference between $1,200 and $1,000. If his salary is $2,000, he would pay an income tax of $20.

Mr. FORDNEY. Let me call the gentleman's attention to this fact: During the Civil War the first income tax imposed on the people first fixed the exemption at $800, and all incomes between $800 and $5,000 were taxed 3 per cent. The following year the exemption was lowered to $600 and the tax was fixed at 5 per cent instead of 3 per cent. That lowering of the exemption by $200 per person and the increasing of the tax by 2 per cent more than doubled up the income taxes collected the following year. In other words, it increased the income the Government received from those taxes in one year from $32,000,000 to $72,000,000.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. In a minute. I say, gentlemen, when we are estimating that 4,000,000 are the only number that will be affected by this exemption, we have the number entirely too low. If you change those lower exemptions, you are going to take from $50,000,000 to $100,000,000 out of this bill. Now I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Is it not a fact that the reason the amount jumped up so in the Civil War was that it compelled a large number of people who had not been making a report, although they were subject to an income tax, to make a report, and that may be true in this case?

Mr. FORDNEY. That may be true. It is claimed by the Secretary of the Treasury that there are a very large number of people in the United States now evading the law by not making a report—people whose income falls within the meaning of the law. I asked to have an amendment added to this bill, and I would like to see the bill yet so amended, that the Government would post in every post office in the United States, at least in every county seat in this country, the names of the people making returns, so that people might know whether or not his neighbor whose duty it is to pay this tax has made his return. I do not want to know the amount of his return; all I want to know is that he makes a return.

Mr. SLOAN. Is it not a fact that on those already paying the income tax there will in each case, married and single, be an increase of $40, which will amount to nearly $15,000,000 additional?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes. Some gentlemen have said, "Oh, the poor man has to pay this tax in another way, because he has to pay a tax on his coffee. There is no tax on coffee, but this bill provides 10 per cent ad valorem on coffee and tea imported, as it does on all other imports. Last year's importations of coffee averaged 9 cents a pound, and 10 per cent ad valorem is nine-tenths of a cent a pound on the coffee a man will use each year. God knows he will not go to the poorhouse on account of that tax. The tax is so small he will not know it when he pays it.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I listened with much interest to the remarks of my friend the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER] and the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS]. Now, the amount of income tax paid in the year 1916 by residents of the State of Iowa was $277,000. Yet her per capita wealth was $3,600, or $600 or $700 more than the per capita wealth of New York and substantially more than the per capita wealth of Illinois. Oklahoma paid more than Iowa. She paid $489,000 as against Iowa's income tax of $277,000. But Oklahoma has, say, $1,200 less per capita wealth than Iowa. And I might go on right through. Oh, how we do protect our own! [Laughter.] I do not think, in Oklahoma or Iowa, those magnificent, wealthy States—and Nebraska is along in the same line—any injustice will be done to Iowa and Nebraska when the exemption is lowered to $2,000 for a married man and $1,000 for a single man. [Applause.]

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Chairman, I hope that the Curry amendment will be adopted. The people who will be benefited by that amendment are not the people who brought on this war but they are the silent workers at home and are the ones who will be affected by the tax on the breakfast table.

Mr. FERRIS. And by the conscription, too.

Mr. BURNETT. And by the conscription. They are many of them people who will not be exempted from conscription because they are employed in the munition factories but are those who will be expected to fight the battles of our country. Mr. Chairman, the Lenroot amendment just adopted takes care of any deficit that the increasing of the amount of these exemptions will make. That Lenroot amendment falls where it ought to fall, on the idle rich. In a little while some gentlemen who are supporting this bill up to this time will make great complaint in behalf of the magazines and of the big newspapers of the country that are responsible for this war and that want to get off without an increase of their postage. Gentlemen, the question before this House is, Are you going to lay this tax on the mechanic and carpenter in your town, the single man getting a yearly income of $1,000, or the married mechanic getting $2,000 income, or the farmer, or the clerk, or the little merchant in the country, who were at home attending to their business when this great war was being foisted upon the country by the magazines and the newspapers that are now trying to get immunity from the increase of taxation against them? That is a question that is up to the Members representing the rural districts and the towns where the poorer people of this country live.

Those who are protesting against the Curry amendment, as a rule, are gentlemen representing the immense wealth of the country. I believe, Mr. Chairman, that it is not right that the man who is toiling for his daily bread, the married man with a big family and an income of $2,000 a year, or the young man with an income of $1,000 a year, perhaps with a dependent mother, father, or sister supported out of that income, should have to pay this tax that has been fastened upon the country by people who are growing rich by the war. Now, that is not demagogy, Mr. Chairman, it is simply an expression of justice and right. We did right a while ago when we adopted the Lenroot amendment, and I believe that this House is going to carry out the same principle that it then laid down by saying that the single man with a salary of $1,000 and the married man with a salary of $2,000, who are having placed upon them the burdens of the increased cost of living, ought not to have to pay the taxes that have been incurred by the war that they had no part in bringing on. I hope that the same unanimity with which the Members of this House a while ago rallied to the support of the Lenroot amendment will cause them to rally to the Curry amendment in order that justice may be done to this poorer class of people upon whom this burden will fall.

Rents are soaring, flour and other foodstuffs are climbing, and how do you expect the little farmer, the poor working man, and the poor clerk or school-teacher to support his family and pay an income tax when you just voted down an amendment to make the Member of Congress pay 65 per cent of his salary of $7,500 per year? Gentlemen, this thing is not being fairly divided, and the day of retribution is sure to come.

Mr. ALMON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. Is the gentleman opposed to the amendment or in favor of it?

Mr. ALMON. I am in favor of it.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there anyone opposed to the amendment?

Mr. KREIDER. I should like to say something against the amendment, if I may be recognized.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. KREIDER. Mr. Chairman, not to-day but on previous occasions Members of this House have appealed to the patriotism not only of Members of Congress but of the people at large. I would like to hear some of those patriotic speeches now. The levying of this tax is made necessary because we have engaged in the European war. The extent of the sacrifices in life, suffering, and treasure we must make to win no one can foretell. Those who were most anxious to uphold the dignity of the Nation then are now, it seems, the least willing to pay the expenses which attends that effort.

I take the position and assert that every patriotic American citizen does not consider paying his mite toward the expenses for the prosecution of this war a burden, but rather a privilege, and I seriously object to having all men whose incomes are less then $3,000 classed as unpatriotic. These people are just as patriotic and just as anxious to fight the battles and contribute to the support of the Nation as those with large incomes, and the truth is that it is this class that makes up the rank and file of our Army and Navy, but they can not all go to the front, and those who do not and can not go are anxious and willing to contribute according to their ability toward the expenses, so that they, too, may have the consciousness and pride of having done their share in supporting the Army and Navy of their country.

Let them have the privilege of that personal pride that comes to them in realizing that it is their Army, their Navy, their war, and their country that is engaged in this struggle; let them have the privilege of showing by actual deeds that they are not slackers and of no account, but, on the contrary, they are paying and contributing their proportionate share of the expense.

I do not care how low you make the tax, make it as low as one-tenth of 1 per cent of the income, if you will, and then graduate by increasing the percentage or rate as the income increases, which will, of course, compel the wealthier classes to pay the large amounts, but by so doing you will recognize those with small incomes and thereby increase their pride and patriotism.

I do not care what the income amounts to in the budget, or how much it will swell the budget, but I repeat that patriotic American citizens ought to be permitted to pay their mite toward the defense of their country. I do not believe that it is a good policy in a church organization to permit one or two parishioners to pay all the expenses of running the church, but I believe that if you want a good live active church, the poorer members must be recognized and be given the opportunity to contribute as their circumstances will permit, even if it is only 1 penny or 5 cents each Sunday, so that they can all have the consciousness of feeling that they are helping to support the church of which they are members. If I had my way about it I would lower the exemption and lower the rate. I would, by the passage of this act, indicate to every man, whether he is handling a pick and shovel, or running a railroad, or president of a bank, whether he is an employee or an employer, whether he is rich or poor, whether his income is large or small, that he is considered by this Congress an American citizen and a part and parcel of this great American people and Government.

Mr. Chairman, it is not a question of dollars and cents that we need to-day, it is patriotism. The standing together, the wiping out of classes, the melting and welding together of the interests of all the American people and for the benefit of the whole country. This must be done if we are going to win this war.

You are not going to stimulate patriotism by letting a few rich men in this country pay the expenses of the war and letting those with small incomes feel that they have no part in it.

I do not regard the paying of $1 or even $10 as placing a great burden on any man, and I do not think, in fact, I am sure that no patriotic citizen regards it so.

Unfortunately we have had on the floor of this House during the consideration of this income-tax measure men who have been making speeches for home consumption only; these speeches they will have printed and sent to their districts so their constituents may see what a gallant fight they are making here in their behalf in order that they may be exempt from this tax. Let me ask those of you who have done this, How are you going to square your action in regard to the conscription bill? When you passed a law authorizing the drafting out of the homes of these very people their sons if they be over 21 years of age and taking them from their loving mother's arms and compelling them to take their chances for their lives in the trenches of Europe and when I offered an amendment requiring that only those volunteering for this duty should be sent, you voted it down. Now, when a little money less than it takes to buy a sucking pig is required you gag and haggle.

I repeat I would like to see and hear a little more of that patriotism we heard so much of a short time ago.

Let those men who were so eager to plunge this country into a war with a European nation then now come forward and pledge their all, their lives and wealth. [Applause.]

Oh, yes; we had a vote a few moments ago whether Members of Congress should contribute a portion of their salaries toward the payment of these war expenses which was voted down, and when I called for a division possibly a half a dozen or so voted with me. I would like to have a roll call on that proposition and then I would like to compare the vote with the vote that was taken when the war resolution was passed.

Oh, yes; we are great patriots when we can let the other fellow do the fighting and pay the bill. We are all ready to agree with Artemus Ward in letting our wife's relations go to war.

Mr. BURNETT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KREIDER. Yes.

Mr. BURNETT. We have had one illustrious example, the gentleman from Massachusetts, Mr. Gardner, is the only warrior who has enlisted so far.

Mr. KREIDER. Yes; and he went as a colonel, a commander. Unfortunately my constituents can not all go as colonels.

Let me impress upon you the fact that the great need after all in America to-day is patriotism. Let every man, woman, and child in the United States be proud of their American citizenship; let them prize it more highly than ever before and let them feel that they are a part and parcel of this great country, and do not deny them recognition nor the opportunity of contributing their mite (however insignificant it may seem, as compared with those with large incomes) in supporting and upholding that flag with the Stars and Stripes in the great conflict that is before us.

Mr. KITCHIN. I ask unanimous consent that all debate on these amendments as to exemption may be closed in six minutes.

Mr. CRAMTON. Does that include all amendments——

Mr. KITCHIN. The amendments as to these exemptions.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that all debate upon this paragraph and amendments thereto close in six minutes.

Mr. KITCHIN. All debate on the exemptions.

The CHAIRMAN. All debate on the exemption amendments shall close in six minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LUNN. I have an amendment as to married men and children, and I can not get it in until after these two.

Mr. KITCHIN. This only refers to these exemptions here.

Mr. ALMON. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House, I am like the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS], not inclined to undertake to amend an important part of this bill which has a unanimous report from the Ways and Means Committee. The exemptions from income tax in time of peace was fixed at $3,000 for a single man and $4,000 for a married man. This bill reduces the first to $1,000 and the second to $2,000. The amendment offered by the gentleman from California [Mr. CURRY] fixes the exemption at $2,000 for a single man and $3,000 for a married man. I think this is about right under present conditions, and I am in favor of the amendment. We should not lose sight of the fact that persons of small income who are affected by this proposed amendment will be forced to pay something additional as the result of almost every item of tax provided for in this bill. We should also remember that the present living expenses of those who are affected by this amendment is more than double what it was before the commencement of the European war. We should also remember that they pay State, county, and municipal taxes and all other taxes imposed by law.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ALMON. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman's State in 1916 paid a total income tax of $109,000.

Mr. ALMON. That may be true, but it has nothing to do with the question under consideration. I will say to my distinguished and venerable friend, Mr. CANNON, of Illinois, that the people of Alabama always do their duty and pay their full share of taxes to the National Government. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Alabama has expired.

Mr. CANNON. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman have an additional minute. The principal industry of the gentleman's State, I believe, is agriculture?

Mr. ALMON. Yes; and mining and manufacturing. I believe Alabama is now about the third State in the manufacture of iron and coal and has some of the largest cotton mills in the South.

Mr. CANNON. Manufactures and agriculture under the draft law are exempt.

Mr. ALMON. They are not; but the law provides that those engaged in industries, including farming, may be exempt from the draft system if found to be necessary to the maintenance of the Military Establishment or the effective operation of the military forces or the maintenance of national interest during the war.

Mr. CANNON. The President can exempt them.

Mr. ALMON. The military bill which has passed both Houses provides that the President may make rules and regulations and appoint boards to determine who shall be exempt from military duty in accordance with the act of Congress, but I want to say to the gentleman from Illinois that no matter what business the men of Alabama between the ages of 21 and 31 are engaged in they are loyal, patriotic American citizens, and that they will respond to the call of their country. Alabama will furnish her full quota of soldiers according to her population. She will furnish as many soldiers, according to population, as will the State of Illinois, or any other State in the Union. And it is no concern of the gentleman from Illinois as to whether they come from the farms, the shops, mines, cotton mills, or any other class of business. They will not only respond, but they will discharge their duties as soldiers as they have always done as private citizens.

Mr. CANNON. They are exempt from conscription and probably can do better service in Alabama than they can in the trenches.

Mr. ALMON. As I have said before, it is of no concern of the gentleman from Illinois from which class of citizens the State of Alabama, which I have the honor to represent in part, furnishes her quota of soldiers during this war. No matter whether they are from our citizens engaged in industries, factories, or from behind the plow upon the farm. They will be brave and gallant men and will be as fearless soldiers as any who have ever marched on a battle field. And there will be no slackers or cowards among them. [Applause.]

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman. I ask that the gentleman's time be extended for two minutes in order that I may propound an inquiry.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I object.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. Chairman, I believe I am just as good a friend of the man who makes his living by honest toil as anybody in this House. I came from among that class myself, and I am proud of it. The argument that is made here to-day in favor of exempting men who have incomes of $2,000 does not stand the light of logic and reason. My friend from Alabama [Mr. BURNETT] says that it will impose a tax upon the poor laboring man in his district. I submit that in my district—and I will guarantee in his—there is not a man who makes his living by honest toil, a laboring man if you please, who gets $2,000 a year. There are about 300 working days in the year when Sundays and holidays are taken out, and if a man makes $6 a day—and very few men who labor for a living make that much salary—he will get only $1,800 a year, and under this bill will not pay a single dollar of tax. If there is a man who makes his living by honest toil upon the farm or upon the railroad or in the shops who is so fortunate as to make $8 a day, then he gets $2,400 a year, and will pay taxes on only $400, after deducting his taxes, or less than $8 per year. The man in my district who is a laboring man and who is fortunate enough to get that much salary, I believe, will be patriotic enough to want to pay this small tax to carry on and to win this war. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired. All time has expired.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. All time has expired. It is fixed by the committee. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA] to the amendment of the gentleman from California [Mr. CURRY].

The question was taken, and the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from California [Mr. CURRY].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. CURRY of California) there were—ayes 50, noes 100.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 4, at the end of section 3, strike out the period and insert the following:

"Provided, That if the person making the return under section 1 of this act (a) shall be the head of a family there shall be an additional exemption of $200 for each minor child dependent upon the taxable parent, but this provision shall operate only in the case of one parent in the same family."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. LUNN. Mr. Chairman, I did not quite understand the wording of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. McCORMICK], and it may be that, as worded, it rules out the one which I desire to offer. I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. LUNN: Page 4, line 15, after the figures "$4,000," insert "and $150 exemption shall be allowed to the head of a family for each child below the age of 16."

Mr. LUNN. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Debate has been closed by order of the committee. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from New York [Mr. LUNN] had a distinct understanding, I believe, with the gentleman from North Carolina that he would be privileged to offer this amendment and debate it.

Mr. KITCHIN. Oh, no.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. LUNN].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. LONDON) there were—ayes 47, noes 78.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

Mr. LUNN. Mr. Chairman, I demand tellers upon that vote.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, it is too late. I make the point of order that the demand comes too late.

The CHAIRMAN. The demand for tellers comes too late, as the Chair had already recognized the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. CRAMTON: At the end of line 17 insert "in the case of unmarried persons, and $2,000 or over in the case of married persons."

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman, in explanation of that amendment——

The CHAIRMAN. Debate has been closed by order of the committee.

Mr. CRAMTON. But I had an express understanding with the gentleman from North Carolina. I made the inquiry as to whether it applied to the whole section and was assured that it did not.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair distinctly stated that the gentleman from North Carolina asked unanimous consent that in six minutes all debate would be closed on the section and all amendments thereto.

Mr. CRAMTON. And thereupon I made an inquiry, and the gentleman from North Carolina corrected the Chair.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that debate upon this and the amendment of the gentleman from New York be extended for 10 minutes. They misunderstood the matter—five minutes each.

Mr. STAFFORD. Was it not the distinct understanding, as stated by the gentleman, that debate would be closed only so far as the exemption amendments were concerned?

Mr. KITCHIN. On the exemption amendments? It is all right. I ask unanimous consent that the time be extended 15 minutes——

Mr. SNYDER. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York objects.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CRAMTON. The amendment which I have offered is not as to exemptions, and an examination of the reporter's notes will show that upon the statement by the Chair I made the inquiry of the gentleman from North Carolina as to whether it was his purpose to have that request apply to the section or only to pending amendments, and he stated it was only as to the exemption amendments. Therefore I withdrew my objection. The notes will sustain my statement. I only desire five minutes. This is not an exemption amendment, but I think one of interest to the committee.

Mr. KITCHIN. I think that was the understanding that it should only be as to exemption amendments. If this is not an exemption amendment——

Mr. CRAMTON. It is not.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understood the gentleman from North Carolina——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I ask that the amendment be read again.

The CHAIRMAN. If the Chair understands debate is continued then of course the Chair will so hold; but the Chair stated that the gentleman from North Carolina asked that debate close in six minutes and so stated to the committee. If he is in error about that of course the Chair would like to be corrected and be fair to every Member here.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this section and the amendments close in 15 minutes.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Chairman, I object.

Mr. KITCHIN. It will save time.

Mr. CRAMTON. An examination of the reporter's notes will substantiate my statement.

Mr. SNYDER. I think it is a different amendment, and I withdraw the objection.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I want to say to my friend who is inclined to object that I listened distinctly to the request made by the gentleman from Michigan and the answer of the gentleman from North Carolina. I agree thoroughly with what the gentleman from North Carolina and the gentleman from Michigan say, that this understanding was only to apply to exemption amendments. If it is not an exemption amendment then it would not apply and I want the amendment read so that we can understand it.

Mr. SNYDER. If it is a different amendment I will withdraw the objection.

Mr. KITCHIN. I ask unanimous consent that debate on this section and all amendments thereto be closed in 15 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto be closed in 15 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, until the amendment is read we can not tell whether this amendment applies to exemptions or not. If it does apply to exemptions, then a point of order would lie against it.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will be again reported.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I ask that it be read in order to understand the meaning of the motion.

The amendment was again reported.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I make the point of order that it does apply to exemptions.

Mr. CRAMTON. Oh, Mr. Chairman, I ask the gentleman to accept my statement. I will withdraw the amendment after making an explanation, if the gentleman does not then think I know what I am talking about.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. It would probably save time to let the gentleman make his statement.

Mr. KITCHIN. I will say to the gentleman that with the amendments already voted down I hardly think this comes within the exemptions——

Mr. CRAMTON. It is not an exemption amendment; I think I know what it is.

Mr. KITCHIN. I think it is not.

Mr. CRAMTON. I would have been through before this.

Mr. KITCHIN. It is one of the return amendments. I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in 15 minutes.

A MEMBER. Five minutes.

Mr. KITCHIN. Fifteen minutes. I want to give the gentleman from New York an opportunity also.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. CRAMTON. Now, Mr. Chairman, the purpose of this whole act is to raise revenues to support our armies at the front. Every dollar that we can save of useless expense in the collection of those revenues is better than a dollar of new tax, because it places a burden on nobody and a dollar of new tax does. In the bill as it now stands a married man with an income of between $1,000 and $2,000 must make a return, although he has no tax to pay. That will entail upon the Government the handling of millions of useless returns, hundreds of thousands of dollars of expense. And so, in harmony with the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD], I have offered this amendment, and in support of it I have not a report of the Efficiency Commission, but a report from a man in Detroit, who is an able business man and who for the past four years has been collector of internal revenue, and who has the following to say about this proposition.

I ask that it be read in my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the letter.

The Clerk read as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
INTERNAL-REVENUE SERVICE,
Detroit, Mich., May 10, 1917.

TO MEMBERS OF CONGRESS FROM STATE OF MICHIGAN:

I wish to call attention to features of the income-tax proposals in the forthcoming revenue bill which would entail a great deal of hardship upon citizens without benefit or revenue to the Government:

I refer to filing returns of income of persons whose net income is between $1,000 and $2,000 and who are not liable to the tax.

In the first district of Michigan it is estimated not less than 250,000 people will be compelled to file returns if this feature applies to all whose net income is $1,000 or more, with the result that the files of the Treasury Department will be cumbered with an enormous mass of returns of persons who are not liable to tax—married men and heads of families.

It is suggested that in connection with this feature of the law no person whose net income is not such as to render him liable to tax under the law be required to file a return. This point is brought out because the present income-tax law requires everyone who receives a net income of $3,000 or more to make return, with the result that many thousands of returns are filed from which the Government derives no tax, and which entails an enormous expense, unnecessarily incurred, and which could be avoided by eliminating such returns.

We estimate that this would reduce the number of returns required by law to be filed by at least three-fourths, with no tax lost to the Government.

Yours, respectfully,
JAMES J. BRADY,
Collector.

Mr. CRAMTON. Now, Mr. Chairman, this will not save any money for anybody except the Government. That man who has been collecting revenue for four years under the income-tax law at Detroit says it will save hundreds of thousands of dollars. That is the kind of an amendment we ought to be looking for, and I hope you can see your way clear to adopt it.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the adoption of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAMTON].

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 4. That in addition to the tax imposed by section 10 of such act of September 8, 1916, there shall be levied, assessed, collected, and paid a like tax of 2 per cent upon the income received in the calendar year 1917 and every calendar year thereafter, by every corporation, joint-stock company or association, or insurance company, subject to the tax imposed by that section, except that if it has fixed its own fiscal year, the tax imposed by this section shall be levied, assessed, collected, and paid only on that portion of its income for the fiscal year ending during the calendar year 1917 which the period between January 1, 1917, and the end of such fiscal year bears to the whole of such fiscal year.

The tax imposed by this section shall be computed, levied, assessed, collected, and paid upon the same incomes and in the same manner as the tax imposed by section 10 of such act of September 8, 1916.

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I wish to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. STERLING of Illinois offers the following amendment: Insert at the end of section 4, page 5, the following:

"Provided, That any corporation which is the owner or holder of the stock of another corporation shall not be required to pay the tax imposed by this section and the tax imposed by section 10 entitled 'An act to increase the revenue, and for other purposes, approved September 8, 1916,' on incomes derived from dividends on such stock on which the tax has been previously paid."

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of this amendment is to avoid paying a tax on the same income twice.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Pardon me just a minute. Does this refer to holding companies?

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. Holding companies and any other corporations that own stock in any other corporation.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. It is not in the printed bill?

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. No; it is not in the printed bill.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. It was agreed to by the committee?

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. This was not agreed to. This was not presented to the committee. The same proposition was presented to the committee in reference to the excess-profit tax, but there was no amendment offered in the committee and no discussion in the committee with reference to double payment of this tax on incomes. As it is now, the corporation pays 2 per cent income tax. This bill adds 2 per cent more, and corporations will pay an income tax of 4 per cent. Now, if some other corporation owns stock in a corporation, it must also pay this 4 per cent tax on that income which it receives from the first corporation, and thus that income, coming from a single source, being a single income, is taxed twice, and the purpose of this amendment is to avoid that double taxation.

Mr. DUPRÉ. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. I yield.

Mr. DUPRÉ. I call attention to page 8, lines 19 to 22, inclusive. I want to ask wherein that provision fails to meet the suggestion that the gentleman makes? I am in sympathy with his amendment.

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. That relates to the excess-profit tax. When we come to that part of the bill, I desire to offer this same amendment in reference to that, because I think that provision in the bill now with reference to that is very uncertain. I doubt very much whether it will exempt the tax under the old law and the tax under this law also. The purpose of the amendment is to exempt the double payment of both the old tax and the tax proposed in this bill.

Mr. RUSSELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. I will.

Mr. RUSSELL. Under the law as it is now the dividend of an individual stockholder in a bank is exempt, is it not?

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. Yes.

Mr. RUSSELL. What you are trying now is simply to make the same law apply to a corporation that applies to an individual?

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. There is an operating company and a holding company. When the operating company pays, the purpose of your amendment, as I understand it, is to prevent a second payment on the proceeds that may be in the holding company?

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. That is it exactly.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. But what is in the holding company over and above what is in the operating company will not be excused?

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. Certainly not.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. Yes; I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. LENROOT. In the case of an individual receiving dividends from a corporation, although that corporation has paid the corporation tax, the individual is not exempted from the income tax, is he?

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. No. But here is the point: The individual does not pay the tax.

Mr. LENROOT. He pays his individual tax?

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. Yes; but the individuals that own the stock in the holding company have to pay the income tax, too; so that you really make them pay the tax three times.

Mr. LENROOT. Is not the principle of the corporation tax an excise tax on the corporation, and should not the holding company be considered a corporation subject to that excise tax?

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. I think not. I think there you are simply taxing the same income twice. It is not just at all. There is no more justice in paying an excise tax twice than any other tax.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. Yes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I think the gentleman misunderstood a question that was asked him. I said that section 204, on page 8, applied to the excess-profits tax.

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. Yes. Section 204 applies to the act of September 8, 1916. That is the income tax.

Mr. FORDNEY. That is the excess-profits tax.

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. I will say in reply to the gentleman this: I think the provision that was put in by the committee applies to the excess-profits tax; but, in any event, it is very uncertain in its language, and I doubt whether it would exempt the double payment of both the old and new tax.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. If the gentleman will pardon me, he has got the dates of those acts mixed. The excess-profits tax was passed March 3, 1917.

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. This amendment that I am offering now exempts the present corporation income tax imposed by this bill and also the tax imposed by section 10 of the act of 1916. That is the income tax. The excess-profits tax was passed in 1917, on the 3d of last March.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. As I understand it, the purpose of the gentleman's amendment is not only to exempt the 2 per cent additional corporation tax provided in this section but also to exempt the original 2 per cent tax that is provided in the act of September last?

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. Yes; to exempt them both.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. Yes.

Mr. HARDY. Do I understand the gentleman to say that if an individual owns stock in a corporation, and the corporation pays a tax on its income, the individual is not required to pay a tax on his income so derived?

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. I did not say so.

Mr. HARDY. Is the individual required to pay a tax on the income that he derives from the corporation, which itself pays a tax?

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. I do not think so.

Mr. HARDY. Well, if the individual stockholder must pay a tax upon his income derived from a corporation which has paid the tax, that is double taxation, too.

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. Yes; but the stockholder in the holding corporation pays just the same, so that it will be paid three times under that theory. He gets his share of the income from the holding corporation, and if he pays the tax it will be paid three times.

Mr. HARDY. So that it is a question of a threefold payment instead of a double payment?

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. Yes.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. Yes.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I want to see if I have got this right or not.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. I ask for one more minute, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I want to see if I have this right in my mind. If I understand your proposition, if the income of the operating corporation has paid this particular tax, then the holding corporation does not pay the tax?

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. No.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. How is it in general taxation? Suppose you have an operating corporation and a holding corporation. They both pay taxes on that same fund, do they not?

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. No.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. It is property, and it is properly taxable.

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. It all belongs to the same person, and the same persons are paying it twice.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. If it is subject to general taxation, it would be subject to taxation twice.

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. It would not. Out in Illinois it would be subject to taxation in the hands of the person who had it on the 1st day of April. It would not be subject to taxation in the hands of any other person.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has again expired.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I hope the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. STERLING] will not pass.

In the first place, we will lose, I should say, not less than $20,000,000 or $25,000,000 in revenue. In the next place, I believe that every corporation, whether it is a holding corporation or not, should pay the normal income tax upon all its income. While the individual now does not pay the normal tax upon the income which he receives from the dividends of corporations that pay that tax, the individual does pay the surtax on the income received as dividends. While the corporation does not pay a surtax at all, no matter whether it makes $50,000 or $1,000,000 or $10,000,000, it ought to pay a normal tax upon all its income. We relieve the holding companies or any other corporation from paying an excess-profits tax upon the dividends received from its subsidiary companies upon which the tax has already been paid. This proposition is entirely different from the normal income tax. For instance, under the gentleman's amendment the United States Steel Corporation would not pay any tax. The United Cigar Co., which, I understand, is largely a holding company, would not pay a dollar, because all of its dividends come from subsidiary companies. I believe a company like the United States Steel Corporation ought to pay the regular normal income tax. When it comes to the excess-profits tax, I believe it is fair to exempt it from the dividends which it receives from the subsidiary companies, but I believe all corporations, whether holding companies or not, ought to pay the normal tax upon their entire net income.

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for three minutes in which to reply to the gentleman from North Carolina.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to proceed for three minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. I hope every Member will understand this proposition. There is no use for gentlemen to talk about taxing corporations. Corporations are owned by individuals. When a corporation issues stock, and another corporation buys some of that stock, as the law is now and as this law will be if we do not adopt this amendment, the corporation that issued the stock and collects the income will pay the income tax on it. Then a portion of that income goes to the holding or owning corporation that has bought some of this stock. That corporation must then account for its income, and it pays the normal tax on that income. Then that holding corporation contributes these funds to the individuals, and they pay their income taxes assessed against them as individuals. So there is no use for gentlemen to talk about taxing corporations. Corporations in the long run do not pay taxes. The taxes come from the people who own the stock. It comes out of the individuals. Under those circumstances they pay the tax three times, if you do not adopt this amendment. I do not know why that kind of property should be compelled to bear these extra burdens. We had just as well be fair about it. I do not know whether it will amount to $20,000,000 or $25,000,000 or not. I do not think it will amount to that. But if it amounts to that much, so much the better reason for adopting this amendment, so much greater is the wrong if all of this property is taxed twice. If the people who own this stock are compelled to stand this tax three times, the greater the amount, the greater the wrong.

Mr. HARDY. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. HARDY. Here is a railroad company that has invested a part of its surplus in the stock of some other company. You admit that if the dividend had gone to the private person who held that stock, he would pay a tax on the income derived from the stock?

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. Yes.

Mr. HARDY. But this railroad company, having bought the stock, would be relieved?

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. Yes; and the owners of the railroad stock have got to pay their income taxes, so the burden is simply shifted from the railroad company to the stockholders of the railroad company.

Mr. LENROOT. Suppose it goes to surplus, and is not passed out in dividends at all?

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. This proposition has nothing to do with that.

Mr. HARDY. As in the case of the large insurance companies.

Mr. FORDNEY. It still goes to the stockholders in the end.

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. If it goes to surplus, it is still property belonging to the stockholders. This does not affect the right of a corporation to pass its earnings to surplus.

Mr. HARDY. Is not the New York Equitable a great insurance company that owns thousands of such stocks, and never passes them on to its stockholders?

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. I do not know whether it does that or not. This will not affect it, in any event.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. I should like to say just a word, Mr. Chairman. It seems to me that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois is a fair and equitable one. Unless this amendment is adopted there is double taxation, and if there is anything that is obnoxious to American legislation in every State it is double taxation. I respectfully suggest that where the normal tax is paid by the operating company there ought to be no normal tax paid by the holding company. If the tax is paid by the individuals in the holding company on their income the holding company stands only in the relation of a trustee, and no trustee is compelled to pay an income tax on the holdings for the cestui que trust.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, I hope this amendment will not be adopted, and it can not in principle be defended. This tax when it applies to a holding corporation is an excise tax on that corporation. That corporation is a citizen of the United States and enjoys certain privileges as such, and the very theory of the corporation tax is to reach all such corporations.

Now, as to the double-taxation proposition, it was suggested during the debate on the income tax that men of great fortunes would escape the income tax because instead of paying dividends they would pass the dividends and put the earnings into surplus. Now, you exempt the holding corporation and you are inviting that thing and saying to the large stockholders of holding corporations, "If you put your earnings into surplus you will not have to pay the income tax." They not only will not pay the income tax on the dividends, because there need be none, but they will pass it to surplus, and if you exempt the holding corporation you will get no tax at all.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. LENROOT. Yes.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. How can any corporation avoid the tax by carrying it to surplus? I know I have heard a lot said on the floor, and the gentleman from Michigan made the statement. How can it escape?

Mr. LENROOT. It is very plain. Suppose here is a corporation with a directorate that is controlled by some very wealthy men and under the law a large portion of their incomes would be taken. That board of directors can pass the dividends, declare no dividend, and then the stockholders of that corporation will have no income tax to pay, so far as the earnings of that corporation are concerned. Is that correct?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. But the corporation will pay the tax.

Mr. LENROOT. Ah, but you are relieving them.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. This amendment only proposes to do away with the double taxation. If corporation A has some surplus it is not using for the time being in its business, it must have it put aside for investment in another stock company or corporation, and suppose in the meantime there is a dividend paid by this other corporation. The other corporation has paid its normal tax and why should the second corporation pay an income tax on the other corporation's property that has already paid a normal tax?

Mr. LENROOT. Suppose an individual desires to escape an ordinary income tax through the dividends that he would naturally receive from the holding corporation?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him another question?

Mr. LENROOT. Let me answer the first one.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. What has the attempt of an individual to escape discharging his duty to do with the square question between the two corporations which taxes the same property?

Mr. LENROOT. They are not the same. One taxes one corporation and the other taxes another corporation.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. It is on the same property.

Mr. LENROOT. I do not propose to let the gentleman get away from this proposition that he now seeks to, where he says it would be impossible for a man to evade his income tax through turning it over to surplus.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. I merely said that that was no answer to my proposition.

Mr. LENROOT. The gentleman denied the accuracy of my statement.

Mr. KITCHIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LENROOT. Yes.

Mr. KITCHIN. Is not it a fact that practically all the so-called holding companies of the corporations are organized for the purpose of getting all of the subsidiary competing companies into a monopoly?

Mr. LENROOT. Absolutely; and that is their very purpose, and this amendment would be putting a premium on that kind of corporation.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I want three minutes on this amendment. The contention of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. STERLING] is correct. It was demonstrated to the committee by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY] that under the laws of Illinois an electric railway company could not organize under the laws of that State and get a charter to build a road from Chicago to St. Louis. They must organize a new company every time they go by a town from one town to another. Under the laws of the State of Illinois a holding company is organized holding these small companies of an electric railway that go from one distant point to another in the State of Illinois. The holding company has no other income except from the small companies, and it is all one company. That holding company is organized to get around the embarrassing laws in the State of Illinois, and the holding company has no other business except to receive the income from those small companies organized to build a road from one town to another. It is all the one company, and unless you adopt this amendment you are going to make those various small companies pay a tax and the holding company also pay over again that same tax. If that is not correct, I want some man to correct me. That is the statement of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY], made when this bill was being considered in the Committee on Ways and Means, and it convinced me that the holding company should not be called upon to pay a tax, and this bill will tax them twice unless you adopt some such amendment as the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. STERLING] has offered here.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois rose.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. What is the regular order?

The CHAIRMAN. It is considering the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. STERLING].

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Chairman, has not debate upon that amendment been exhausted?

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate upon this section and all amendments thereto close in 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that all debate upon this amendment shall close?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes; that all debate upon the section and all amendments thereto shall close in 10 minutes.

Mr. FORDNEY. Close it in five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. FORDNEY. I object. We ought not to run along here indefinitely on a subject thoroughly discussed. I want gentlemen to talk and have plenty of time; but why not make that five minutes?

Mr. KITCHIN. Make it six minutes.

Mr. FORDNEY. Very well, I accept that.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, it will only take me one minute to say what I have got to say. [Applause.] That is the first real hearty applause that I have received in this House. I practice law in Illinois, and I have listened with some attention to what the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY] has said about this thing. He is mistaken about it.

Mr. FORDNEY. I got it from the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY].

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Well, if that is his contention, he is mistaken. I know what the law is, because I have organized these railroads down there. We have two laws in Illinois—one by which you can organize interurban roads between towns—and that is the law that the gentleman speaks of.

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Yes.

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. I want to say to the gentleman that he may have practiced law in Illinois, but to organize an electric interurban railroad in Illinois you have to do it under the railroad law. There is not any law for organizing interurban railroads in Illinois.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. There is a law in Illinois known as the general railroad law, under which these roads are organized, and that does not require you to build only between towns, but under that you can go all over the State of Illinois, and I believe the gentleman will admit that that is true. These corporations do not need to own and organize any holding corporations. They can be organized under the general railroad law. Then they would pay their taxes and their excess-profits taxes like anyone else, and I believe they ought to do it.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. STERLING of Illinois) there were—ayes 17, noes 71.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 5. That every individual, corporation, joint-stock company or association, or insurance company, that is liable to pay or that has paid the taxes imposed by Title I of such act of September 8, 1916, upon the net income received in the calendar year 1916, shall pay, in addition to such taxes, a tax equivalent to 33⅓ per cent of such taxes, to be assessed and collected under the provisions of existing law, and paid on or before September 15, 1917, except that in the case of a corporation, joint-stock company or association, or insurance company, which has fixed its own fiscal year, such tax shall be paid within 165 days after the close of the fiscal year ending during the calendar year 1917.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the section.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, can we not come to some agreement about time for debate upon this and all amendments to the section? How would 30 or 40 minutes do?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Would it not be better to leave the matter open until to-morrow?

Mr. KITCHIN. Oh, then, gentlemen will want to debate it for three hours. I have talked with some gentlemen who are very much opposed to this, and they are willing to have 30 minutes. Let us put it at 45 minutes.

Mr. MADDEN. Make it an hour.

Mr. MANN. Make it half an hour on a side.

Mr. KITCHIN. Very well, half an hour for those in favor and half an hour for those opposed to it.

Mr. DYER. Who will control the time?

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate upon this section and all amendments thereto be closed in one hour, and that half the time be controlled——

Mr. MANN. Well, half of the time to be allotted to those in favor and half to those against.

Mr. KITCHIN. And the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] to control the time of those against, and I will control the time of those in favor of the section.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that there shall be one hour's debate upon section 5, just read, and all amendments thereto, one half the time to be controlled by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] and the other half by the gentleman from North Carolina. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now arise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee having assumed the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. FOSTER, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 4280 and had come to no resolution thereon.

HOUR OF MEETING TO-MORROW—11 A. M.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at 11 a. m. to-morrow.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at 11 a. m. to-morrow. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 59 minutes p. m.) the House, under its previous order, adjourned to meet at 11 a. m. to-morrow, Friday, May 18, 1917.

SENATE.

FRIDAY, May 18, 1917.

(Legislative day of Thursday, May 17, 1917.)

The Senate reassembled at 12 o'clock m., on the expiration of the recess.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by D. K. Hempstead, its enrolling clerk, announced that the House had passed a concurrent resolution (H. Con. Res. 8) authorizing and directing the clerk in the enrollment of the bill (H. R. 3545) to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States to strike out the word "member" in the fifth line of the matter inserted by the committee of conference on the bill and amendment and to insert in lieu thereof the word "number," in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (H. R. 2337) to amend an act entitled "An act making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917, and for other purposes," relative to enrollments in the Naval Reserve Force, and it was thereupon signed by the Vice President.

INCREASE OF MILITARY ESTABLISHMENT.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I ask that the concurrent resolution be laid before the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a concurrent resolution from the House of Representatives, which will be read.

The concurrent resolution was read, as follows:

House concurrent resolution 8.

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That, in the enrollment of the bill H. R. 3545, entitled "An act to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States, the Clerk be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to strike out the word "member" in the fifth line of the matter 'nserted by the committee of conference on said bill and amendment and insert in lieu thereof the word "number."

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The resolution speaks for itself. The bill has the word "member" written in it where it ought to be "number" in its engrossment. I ask for the adoption of the resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the concurrent resolution is agreed to.

CONSERVATION OF FOOD PRODUCTS.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a communication from the governor of Kansas, which will be incorporated in the RECORD.

The communication is as follows:

TOPEKA, May 15, 1917.

Hon. THOMAS R. MARSHALL,
Vice President, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. MARSHALL: I respectfully appeal to you to advance the food-control bill as an emergency measure that should precede all other legislation after the passage of the bill providing an increase of the Army. Sentiment is united on the need of the pending bill for the stringent control of food markets at the earliest moment and the safety of the public welfare.

Events are proving we can not temporize with greed. I urge as speedily as possible the suspension of speculative activities of all exchanges and maximum and minimum prices for food products and coal. I urge during the period of the war, as may be necessary, that the Government take over all storage plants, packing houses, warehouses, terminal elevators, coal mines, and such other industries and utilities as may be required for the control of the marketing and distribution of necessities

I am constantly receiving urgent appeals from those suffering from exhorbitant prices, or from market manipulation. They ask that something be done for their relief or protection.

The American food gambler, whom the Government is defending in this war, in common with other citizens, is proving a greater foe to his countrymen and a greater menace to his country than is the enemy. I believe the Government is justified in going to any lengths to deal with him as promptly and as expeditiously as it would with a common and less dangerous traitor.

Very respectfully, ARTHUR CAPPER, Governor.

TRANSPORTATION OF RECRUITS.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, I have a letter this morning from a citizen of Michigan whom I know and for whom I have the highest respect. He relates a situation which I am going to take this opportunity of placing before the Senate:

Fay Kentner, a son of Homer Kentner, a veteran of the Civil War, fired by the wave of patriotism which is sweeping the country, went to the recruiting station at Traverse City and enlisted for the Army. He was examined and accepted, sent to Grand Rapids, where he was once more examined and forwarded to Columbus, Ohio, where he was examined again and rejected. He was obliged to pay his own transportation back to Honor. His friends do not feel that he was treated right.

He had shown a willingness to enlist and was accepted at two recruiting offices. He has no means of his own. That kind of treatment is intended to discourage enlistments in that county.

Mr. THOMAS. And everywhere else.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. And everywhere else. Surely the Government of the United States has not reached a point where it will treat its patriotic young men in the manner described by this letter.

I do not mean to criticize the War Department and the Secretary of War. I am one of those Republicans who greatly respect the Secretary of War. I think he has come to his great task from private life with a vigor and an intelligence which are rare and that he is making splendid progress in comprehending the scope and necessities of his high office. He is a man of initiative, courage, and of kindness, and he is approachable at all times, so far as my observation goes.

But down the line further there does not appear the courtesy which is properly due from soldiers to citizens. I know of instances where recruiting officers have destroyed in the presence of an applicant their letters of commendation and indorsement, simply brushing them aside as of no consequence or as being unworthy of consideration.

In the case of Mr. Kentner I think it is shameful for the Government to send that boy out to Columbus from his home in northern Michigan at his own expense and then turn him adrift among strangers after he has passed two examinations at two recruiting stations for admission into the Army.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. May I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Certainly.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I am in thorough accord with the Senator's view that to do that would be a very great injustice; but we have tried to remedy that situation under the act approved May 12, 1917. I call the Senator's attention to it, because some such cases had been suggested to us. On page 16 of public Document No. 11, Sixty-fifth Congress, this provision is in the appropriation act:

Transportation of the Army and its supplies: For transportation of the Army and its supplies, including transportation of the troops when moving either by land or water, and of their baggage, including members of the Officers' Reserve Corps, enlisted men of the Enlisted Reserve Corps, and retired enlisted men when ordered to active duty, including the cost of packing and crating—for transportation of recruits and recruiting parties; of applicants for enlistment between recruiting stations and recruiting depots; for travel allowance to enlisted men on discharge.

As I understand it, this young man had been examined at one place and admitted and then sent to the recruiting depot and was not accepted?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Yes, Mr. President.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. That is equivalent to a discharge, and he is entitled to transportation under the last appropriation act.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I think he is, and it would be a most unfortunate thing if any other rule should prevail.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. What is the date of the letter?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. May 15.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. This act was only approved on the 12th. The Senator will see that there was hardly time to be advised.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Certainly not. Does the Senator think that the act of May 12 would cover this case?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I think it does.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Of course his enlistment did not occur since the passage of the act and I do not suppose his discharge took place after the passage of the act.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. That may possibly be true, but I am inclined to believe that that is the correct position which was sought to be cured by an amendment to the appropriation act, because a young man in that situation ought to have his expenses paid.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Yes, Mr. President. I think there is no justification for that kind of treatment at the hands of officers of the Government. I have the greatest respect for our officials and for the Army and Navy, and I am not captious; I do not desire to criticise them unfairly; but I do insist that when a young man displays his patriotism and his courage and offers his services to the Government to fight its battles he is entitled to courteous treatment and every officer of the Government, civil or military, should encourage his effort and make him sure that his unselfishness and his valor are certain passports to courtesy and fair treatment.

EQUIPMENT OF NATIONAL GUARD.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. While I am on my feet, I am only going to take another moment to say that I suppose the delay in equipping the National Guard for reentrance into the Federal service has been incident to the delay in the passage of this bill. Has it not, I ask the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Measurably it has been, but I will say to the Senator that even before this time, and while the mobilization was going on upon the Mexican border, they were not very well equipped for the National Guard. I think they are endeavoring now to get in a condition to equip all the forces provided for.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I hope something may be done to show the appreciation of this Government for the National Guard. They stand ready for service, they are volunteers, they make up a tremendous and vital force in the Army, they are a fine type of men, they come from industrial communities throughout the country and from civil employments, they are ready for service whenever duty calls, and they ought not to be discouraged and unduly delayed.

I am not criticizing anyone; I am just laying down the principle which I try to follow in the conduct of my official duties, and which I think should be applied to other departments of the Government.

I hope that the latitude we are giving and the power we are vesting in single individuals is not calculated to make them discourteous or distrustful or disrespectful of the rights of the individual citizens of the Republic.

COUNCIL OF NATIONAL DEFENSE.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, the public are generally interested in the work of the Advisory Commission of the Council of National Defense. One paragraph of the bill now before the Senate has reference to that council. I wish therefore to ask the Secretary to read a letter which I received yesterday from Mr. Bernard M. Baruch, a member of the advisory commission, explaining the work which is being done, and particularly that division of the work which is under his supervision. I ask to have it read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. MARTIN. As the Senator knows, we took a recess in order to bring the unfinished business before the Senate this morning.

Mr. THOMAS. This relates to the unfinished business.

Mr. MARTIN. To save time rather than discussion about it I will make no objection, but I hope the Senator will realize that we ought not to have any morning hour. We recessed in order to avoid it.

Mr. THOMAS. I think the Senator will find when the letter is read that it bears directly upon the bill.

Mr. MARTIN. I have no objection. We will save time by having it read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

THE ADVISORY COMMISSION OF THE
COUNCIL OF NATIONAL DEFENSE,
Washington, D. C., May 17, 1917.

Hon. CHARLES S. THOMAS,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: Strange as it may seem, there is a great deal of misunderstanding as to the functions of the Advisory Commission of the Council of National Defense. This commission was appointed by the President. There never has been any other appointment to the commission by anyone else.

The purpose of the council and the commission was to so coordinate business that in time of war the great masses of raw materials and the industries of the country could be brought into immediate use for the benefit of the State. With that end in view the various members of the commission undertook to organize the raw materials and the industries. I was appointed as chairman of the committee on raw materials. As that chairman I believe I have organized the raw materials in as efficient a way as could possibly be done, to the end that they can be reached easier and quicker than any other way.

I have accomplished this by making committees to handle each raw material as large as was necessary to cover the field and as small as possible, so as to have a working organization. These committees have already rendered great service to the Government and now stand ready to act for the Government whenever they are so ordered or requested. Through these committees the Government will be able to get materials much quicker and better than through the process of bidding in the open market as heretofore.

Close to 50,000,000 pounds of copper has been offered to the Government by the copper interests at an approximate saving of $10,000,000. I believe now that through this committee many hundreds of millions of pounds of copper required by the allies and our own Government departments, such as the Army, the Navy, and the Panama Canal Commission can be bought at prices that will show an enormous saving.

The zinc committee has already contracted for some 25,000,000 pounds of zinc at practically two-thirds of the market price and stand ready to use its efforts to effect further savings on the enormous quantities that must be bought.

Through the steel committee the Navy Department contracted for several hundred thousand tons of ship plates and other materials at great concessions. When ship plates were selling at $160 a ton, the Navy bought them at $58 a ton, and further large savings can be made if the huge amounts of steel and steel products that will be used by the Government in the conduct of the war are handled by this committee.

The aluminum committee purchased for the Government its needs of aluminum at 27½ cents per pound when the same companies' regular price to large purchasers was 38 cents and the market price was 60 cents.

The chemical committee is now engaged in negotiations with the fertilizer interests of the country, which will stabilize and lower prices.

The oil committee has closed contracts for the delivery of oil to the Navy that were of a very highly satisfactory nature as regards to price and deliveries.

These are only a part of the activities.

None of these committees are in any way executive, but have only advised with and helped the departments in the purchase of their supplies. I doubt very much without these agencies whether the departments would have been able to obtain the materials except at enormously advancing prices above the market. Instead, they have received these deliveries when they wished and at prices below the market.

The spirit of the business men has been perfectly fine and splendid. I feel certain that were your colleagues to understand the nature of the business done by the advisory commission and the spirit in which they have undertaken it, that they would have a different feeling toward the commission.

These committees have been appointed absolutely without question as to a man's politics but simply for his fitness and ability to be of service to the Government. Not having all of the vision or wisdom, one perhaps does not always pick out the very best that can receive the approval of all, but, taking it all in all, I do not see how the committees could be improved upon.

It would give me great pleasure to tell either you or any of your associates of my work upon the commission, and I feel certain the other members of the commission feel the same way.

The only desire that I have seen so far has been the desire to be helpful in this hour of need.

Very truly, yours,

BERNARD M. BARUCH.

PURCHASE OF NAVAL SUPPLIES.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, there has been some discussion concerning the purchase of supplies, and so forth, for the Navy Department. I have here an order issued by Chief Paymaster McGowan of date April 18, 1917, regarding these purchases, which I ask to have printed in the RECORD without reading.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NAVY DEPARTMENT,
BUREAU OF SUPPLIES AND ACCOUNTS,
Washington, D. C., April 18, 1917.

To: All commanders in chief, commandants of navy yards and stations and naval districts, and commanding officers ashore and afloat.
Subject: Competition in making purchases.

1. The following S and A intrabureau order is quoted for the information and guidance of all concerned:

"During the last few days there have come to the Paymaster General's attention several cases where purchasing officers requested that competition be waived because careful inquiry in the market had developed the fact that articles urgently required to meet emergency needs could not possibly be obtained except from some one particular firm.

"It was pointed out in each such instance that nothing could be more inappropriate than approving a 'competition waived' requisition under conditions thus described, the reason being that, assuming that the facts were as stated, there was surely the keenest kind of competition imaginable, namely competition among the purchasers anxious to obtain the articles (which is necessarily more keen than any competition possibly could be between different firms seeking to supply the same).

"Whenever any such cases arise—and they unquestionably will from time to time—it is to be distinctly borne in mind that the requisition to cover emergency purchase will contain on its face a plain statement of the exact facts—the use of such words as 'competition waived' or other more or less meaningless terms to be scrupulously avoided.

"When, for good and sufficient reasons established in advance, it does (as it seldom will) become necessary to waive competition, the words 'in favor of ———' will not under any circumstances be employed. When competition needs to be waived, it is not in fact waived 'in favor of' any firm or person, but because the exigencies of the service make it necessary—competition being waived, if at all, 'in favor of' the United States!

"It can not be too clearly borne in mind, therefore, that the statement on any requisition or other paper that competition has been or is to be waived 'in favor of' any outside establishment is misleading and highly objectionable.

"In this connection attention is particularly invited to the following extract from the Paymaster General's second indorsement 75-2, 402-21, of March 20, 1917, in regard to the undesirability of waiving competition:

"'Indeed it is even doubtful whether quicker deliveries are obtained in this way—the reason being that, once it becomes known that competitive bidding is departed from, almost any firm that gets an urgent inquiry is apt to figure less carefully on quoting a low price and at the same time allow itself plenty of latitude in the matter of when the goods shall be delivered.

"'In very urgent cases it is customary, of course, to make purchase by telephone. When the need for such a purchase is known it takes a very few minutes more to call up two or three or four firms than it takes to call up only one, because nearly any quotation requires some little consideration before it is made.

"'The result will in most cases be found to be that, while the first firm queried is working on its quotation and the time of delivery, it is very easy to call up two or three others, setting the time for decision, say, one hour from the time the original telephone call is made and notifying each of the firms queried that competition is being obtained not only as to price but with respect to time of delivery. The result, under such circumstances, is that each of such firms figures as closely as possible and also cuts down the time limit to the lowest minimum, which, as already pointed out, is not very apt to be the case if such firm has reason to think that there is no competition.

"'In view of all of these facts the Paymaster General is convinced that nothing much more demoralizing and more completely destructive of the integrity of the Navy's entire supply system could possibly occur than for this department to once start in conferring on anybody blanket authority to waive competition.'"

2. Please acknowledge receipt.

McGOWAN.

THE PRESIDENT'S ADDRESS AT THE RED CROSS DEDICATION.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I ask to have printed in the RECORD, without reading, the address made by President Wilson at the Red Cross dedication on the 12th of May, 1917. In order that there may be no dispute about the text I offer the address as it appears in the Official Bulletin published daily under order of the President by the Committee on Public Information, George Creel, chairman. I have the Bulletin for May 14, containing the address, and I ask to have the address printed without reading.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

The address by the President is as follows:

ADDRESS BY THE PRESIDENT AT RED CROSS DEDICATION.

"Mr. Chairman, Mr. Secretary, ladies, and gentlemen, it gives me a very deep gratification as the titular head of the American Red Cross to accept in the name of that association this significant and beautiful gift, the gift of the Government and of private individuals who have conceived their duty in a noble spirit and upon a great scale. It seems to me that the architecture of the building, to which the secretary alluded, suggests something very significant.

"There are few buildings in Washington more simple in their lines and in their ornamentation than the beautiful building we are dedicating this evening. It breathes a spirit of modesty and seems to adorn duty with its proper garment of beauty. It is significant that it should be dedicated to women who served to alleviate suffering and comfort those who were in need during our Civil War, because their thoughtful, disinterested, self-sacrificing devotion is the spirit which should always illustrate the services of the Red Cross.

NEEDS SUPPORT OF PEOPLE.

"The Red Cross needs at this time more than ever it needed before the comprehending support of the American people and all the facilities which could be placed at its disposal to perform its duties adequately and efficiently. I believe that the American people perhaps hardly yet realize the sacrifices and sufferings that are before them. We thought the scale of our Civil War was unprecedented, but in comparison with the struggle into which we have now entered the Civil War seems almost insignificant in its proportions and in its expenditure of treasure and of blood. And therefore it is a matter of the greatest importance that we should at the outset see to it that the American Red Cross is equipped and prepared for the things that lie before it.

CREATION OF WAR COUNCIL.

"It will be our instrument to do the works of alleviation and mercy which will attend this struggle. Of course, the scale upon which it shall act will be greater than the scale of any other duty that it has ever attempted to perform. It is in recognition of that fact that the American Red Cross has just added to its organization a small body of men whom it has chosen to call its war council—not because they are to counsel war, but because they are to serve in this special war those purposes of counsel which have become so imperatively necessary.

"Their first duty will be to raise a great fund out of which to draw the resources for the performance of their duty, and I do not believe that it will be necessary to appeal to the American people to respond to their call for funds, because the heart of this country is in this war, and if the heart of the country is in the war, its heart will express itself in the gifts that will be poured out for these humane purposes. I say the heart of the country is in this war because it would not have gone into it if its heart had not been prepared for it. It would not have gone into it if it had not first believed that here was an opportunity to express the character of the United States. We have gone in with no special grievance of our own, because we have always said that we were the friends and the servants of mankind.

"We look for no profit. We look for no advantage. We will accept no advantage out of this war. We go because we believe that the very principles upon which the American Republic was founded are now at stake and must be vindicated.

"In such a contest, therefore, we shall not fail to respond to the call for service that comes through the instrumentality of this particular organization. And I think it not inappropriate to say this: There will be many expressions of the spirit of sympathy and mercy and philanthropy, and I think that it is very necessary that we should not disperse our activities in those lines too much; that we should keep constantly in view the desire to have the utmost concentration and efficiency of effort; and I hope that most, if not all, of the philanthropic activities of this war may be exercised if not through the Red Cross, then through some already constituted and experienced organization.

NO WAR FOR AMATEURS.

"This is no war for amateurs. This is no war for mere spontaneous impulse. It means grim business on every side of it, and it is the mere counsel of prudence that in our philanthropy as well as in our fighting we should act through the instrumentalities already prepared to our hand and already experienced in the tasks which are going to be assigned to them. This should be merely the expression of the practical genius of America itself, and I believe that the practical genius of America will dictate that the efforts in this war in this particular field should be concentrated in experienced hands, as our efforts in other fields will be.

"There is another thing that is significant and delightful to my thought about the fact that this building should be dedicated to the memory of the women both of the North and of the South. It is a sort of landmark of the unity to which the people have been brought, so far as any old question which tore our hearts in days gone by are concerned; and I pray God that the outcome of this struggle may be that every other element of difference amongst us will be obliterated and that some day historians will remember these momentous years as the years which made a single people out of the great body of those who call themselves Americans. The evidences are already many that this is happening. The divisions which were predicted have not occurred and will not occur. The spirit of this people is already united, and when effort and suffering and sacrifice have completed the union, men will no longer speak of any lines either of race or association cutting athwart the great body of this Nation. So that I feel that we are now beginning the processes which will some day require another beautiful memorial erected to those whose hearts uniting united America."

TRIBUNALS AND CERTIFICATES OF EXEMPTION.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I wish to present, for reference to the proper committee, a compilation by the Legislative Reference Division of the Library of Congress on the tribunals and certificates of exemption under the military-service acts of Great Britain. I wish to have this compilation printed as a Senate document, and ask that it be referred to the appropriate committee.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The matter will be referred to the Committee on Printing for action.

SENATE VOTE OF ROOSEVELT ARMY DIVISION AMENDMENT.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, on yesterday while I was discussing what is known as the Roosevelt amendment to the Military Establishment bill the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN], who had charge of the bill, said he desired to have, and he requested me to have, inserted in my remarks the vote of the Senate on that amendment when it was pending before this body on April 28. I told him that I would so insert it, but last evening after the adjournment I did not have time to give the matter attention and neglected to do what I promised to have done. This morning I prepared the data which I promised to furnish, and, keeping faith with the Senator from Oregon, I now ask that the vote may be inserted in the RECORD in the form in which I have prepared it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The vote referred to is as follows:

Senate vote on Roosevelt amendment, April 28, 1917:

YEAS.

Republicans	36
Democrats	20
	56

NAYS.

Republicans	4
Democrats	27

Per cent of Democrats voting for Roosevelt amendment, 35 per cent plus.

Per cent of Republicans voting against Roosevelt amendment, 13 per cent minus.

Per cent of Democrats voting against Roosevelt amendment, 87 per cent plus.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

A message from the House of Representatives, by J. C. South, its Chief Clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills, and they were thereupon signed by the Vice President:

H. R. 2343. An act granting consent to Ernest B. Denison, A. J. Barchfield, and Ethan I. Dodds to construct a bridge across the Wabash River within or near the city limits of the city of Vincennes, Ind.; and

H. R. 3545. An act to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States.

ARMY AND NAVY APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. MARTIN. I ask for the regular order, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The pending measure is Senate bill 2263, the title of which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 2263) to provide further for the national security and defense, to conserve foods, feeds, and fuels, and to prevent monopolies, conspiracies, and other evil practices respecting the same, and for other purposes.

Mr. MARTIN. It is understood between the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry [Mr. GORE] and myself that he would give way for the bill making appropriations to supply urgent deficiencies for the Military and Naval Establishments, and so forth, and I now ask unanimous consent that that bill be taken up for consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 3971) making appropriations to supply urgent deficiencies in appropriations for the Military and Naval Establishments on account of war expenses for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917, and for other purposes.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, on yesterday, when the conference report upon the Military Establishment bill was before the Senate, we found, as Senators recall, that language which the Senate had placed in the bill had been omitted in conference, and the suggestion was made that, instead of voting against the conference report, we might add a section to the Military and Naval Establishment bill to-day covering the same proposition. At that time I read to the Senate a proposed section, which was in a measure submitted then to the Senate for its criticism, to be added at the close of the bill, which was as follows:

SEC. 4. That the language "existing emergency" or "emergency" used in the act passed at the present session of Congress entitled "An act to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States," is hereby declared to mean the war with Germany.

The chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN] had expressed his willingness that this amendment should go upon the bill which is now being considered by the Senate. I offer it at this time because I think it might be well for us to dispose of it while our minds are fresh on the subject. I desire to ask the consent of the chairman of the committee that the amendment which I have just stated be now considered and disposed of.

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. President, to avoid a prolonged discussion I will agree to that, but the amendment could come in just as well later on. Still, however, the line of least resistance, I think, is to let the amendment be now considered, and I have no objection.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Georgia will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add at the end of the bill a new section, as follows:

SEC. 4. That the language "existing emergency" or "emergency" used in the act passed at the present session of Congress entitled "An act to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States," is hereby declared to mean the war with Germany.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment will be agreed to.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I think the language of the amendment is objectionable as it stands, and I think the Senator from Georgia will be willing to modify it on having it called to his attention.

The Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] yesterday drew attention to the fact that the war might end and yet the emergency might continue for some time after the war. The war might end by a treaty of peace and the proclamation of the President would necessarily issue after that treaty was signed; but it might be necessary, as it has been necessary in many wars, to continue the soldiers in the field and under discipline for some time thereafter. It would, therefore, be a mistake to end the enlistment of the soldier at the time that the war ended. Either the Senator from Georgia should provide that the force of the law should continue for three or six months after the declaration or proclamation of peace, or he should provide that the word "emergency" used in the bill should be construed to be the emergency growing out of the war with Germany. I should like to ask the Senator from Georgia whether or not he would be willing to modify his amendment so as to have it read "shall be construed to be the emergency growing out of the war with Germany"?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I will say to the Senator from Nebraska that I wrote the amendment in that way at first, but it was objected to by Senators. I then struck out the words "emergency caused by the war," and left it as it is, to meet the views of the Senate when it was presented on yesterday.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I think the objection stated by the Senator from New York on yesterday was insuperable.

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. President——

Mr. HITCHCOCK. It certainly seems to me that it would be folly on the part of Congress to declare that the word "emergency," as used in the bill which we have already passed, should be construed to be the war itself. Almost every war, without exception, has been followed by a period in which the maintenance of men under arms has been necessary for some time after the conclusion of peace. Therefore I think the Senator from Georgia should amend the language of his amendment so as to state that the word "emergency" shall be construed to be the emergency growing out of the war with Germany. That would accomplish the purpose which the Senator has in mind. I ask the Senator if he could not amend his amendment accordingly?

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I yield.

Mr. REED. I thought the Senator had concluded.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Not entirely. I think that this matter is one which ought to be thoroughly understood. It seems to me to be vital, of considerable importance. It will not do to adopt this provision here without any consideration of its possible results.

Suppose peace is concluded by a treaty; suppose the President, as would then be necessary, issues his proclamation of peace and the soldiers are still in Europe—if it happens that we are compelled to send soldiers to Europe—can they be disbanded there and their period of enlistment be ended? Or suppose that under the conditions of peace agreed to between the nations certain obligations must be performed by the parties to the war, until those obligations are performed the armies must be kept in the field, although the war itself has actually ended.

Mr. HARDWICK. Let me ask the Senator a question, Mr. President.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I yield to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. HARDWICK. Suppose one of the obligations was that we should contribute a certain number of soldiers to a world league of peace?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. No such peace could be concluded without the assent of the Senate, two-thirds concurring.

Mr. HARDWICK. I want to see how far the Senator is going along that line. I have that question in mind. It is a very substantial one, to my way of thinking, and I do not want anything done here that will foreclose that question on us.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. That is a matter that Congress shall have to meet when it comes.

Mr. HARDWICK. If we were to adopt language of the character the Senator suggests, while it is true we might have to decide on that policy, then once we did decide on that policy, standing alone, we would have the men already drafted for that service.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I can conceive, Mr. President, no more serious calamity than to have it enacted into law that these soldiers are to be discharged upon the conclusion of peace, when it may be absolutely necessary to keep them in the field for 30, 60, or 90 days, or even six months, until the terms of peace are carried into effect.

Mr. HARDWICK. But, Mr. President, if the Senator will yield further——

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I yield.

Mr. HARDWICK. It seems to me, if I have read history correctly, that there never has been a great war concluded without long delay in the peace negotiations. Treaties of peace are not signed, as a rule, until long after armistices have been declared and all necessity for the contending forces remaining in the field has been removed. I think that probably long before the formal treaty of peace following this war is ratified every question, except some of the details, will have been disposed of. However, I am not seriously opposed to the proposition to fix a time limit if it is made definite and for a short period, say not over 90 days after the declaration of peace. I would be willing to meet the Senator that far, so far as I have anything to do with it.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I think there are dangers in that direction. We might at this time incorporate in the bill a provision that these men should remain in the service 90 days after the conclusion of peace, and yet it might be necessary in the very terms of peace to allow six months for the execution of the terms of peace. Certainly that is a matter that we can not foresee now.

Mr. HARDWICK. No; and that is the trouble. It might be necessary to allow six years. I do not know how long a time it might be necessary to allow. We can not foresee those things, but if it is necessary to provide another military force, then let us provide it when we get to the time when it becomes necessary.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I yield to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Let me suggest to the Senator that the objection to what he has suggested is its indefiniteness.

Mr. HARDWICK. That is the difficulty.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Now, let me suggest that the term be made not exceeding six months after the declaration of peace. That, it seems to me, will fix a definite time within which the President can order the disbanding of the Army. He could disband them before the six months, or, if the exigency should arise, he could keep them in the service for that period, as he should deem best. I think, however, we should limit the period to six months, or at least provide a definite time for the service of the troops.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Well, Mr. President, so far as I am individually concerned——

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. PHELAN. The amendment seems to be designed automatically to close the period of the emergency. Congress can terminate the emergency at any time. It seems to me that it would be extremely dangerous to hamper the operations of the Government engaged in a great war by a mere reference to the war with Germany. There are other belligerents than Germany, Austria-Hungary, for instance, and it is conceivable that the war might be terminated with Germany, but, growing out of that war, there would be on the hands of the United States other enemy powers. It certainly would be perilous to bring to a stop automatically the operation of the legislation which we have passed providing for an army without Congress having an opportunity to act. If the President, by reason of the exigency, should overlook this provision, he would be accused of usurping power. It seems to me it is a crisis in which large power should in this respect be given to the Commander in Chief of the Army and the Navy.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, will the Senator from Nebraska yield to me for a moment?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SHAFROTH. The suggestion which the Senator from California [Mr. PHELAN] has made, to the effect that Congress could at any time act, would apply to his contention just as well as to the proposition which he was combating. I believe there should be some definite time fixed. I think there ought to be perhaps six months or even a year allowed for the necessary adjustments to take place; but if we are going to become involved in war with another nation, unquestionably Congress would be here for the purpose of providing an army and providing the time of its service. It seems to me some definite term should be placed on the service of the army about to be organized.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, so far as I am individually concerned, I believe that six months would be a sufficient time. I do not believe, however, that the fixing of a definite term is as good as the use of the word "emergency"; but I certainly think that the amendment should provide that the act should be in force for at least six months after the conclusion of peace. Then it will be in the hands of the President, who will issue his proclamation when that event occurs.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me, let me ask why the six months' leeway? Most of these soldiers will be enlisted for the war. When the President proclaims the war at an end the contract of the Government ends. Does the Senator desire to raise a question as to the status of the soldier after the actual close of the war?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. No. I have explained the situation, but I will go over it once more.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Let me go one step further.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Let me tell the Senator exactly what I mean. The war, say, is fought for a year, and finally an agreement is reached to consider terms of peace. Terms of peace are considered, are signed, and ratified by the legislative bodies of all the nations, and the President issues his proclamation of peace, and our Army is still in Europe. Does the Senator want to release the men from the Army at that time? Under this proposal their periods of service would be over; the Government would have no charge or jurisdiction over them, and could exercise no discipline over them. So there must be a reasonable time after the conclusion of peace before the men are actually released. That is necessary, even if there are no obligations to perform.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I do not want to release them, if the Senator will permit me, under the circumstances he suggests, but I do not want them, either, if they accept the proclamation of peace by the President and leave for their homes, when they are in distant lands and have no means of information as to the intricacies surrounding peace, to be charged with desertion because they have gone away. They have entered into their contract for the war, and they have performed it. There is no use hampering the soldier.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I am sure the Senator from Michigan would not seriously contend that as soon as the terms of peace are signed, if we at that time had 800,000 soldiers in Europe, they should be disbanded in Europe. They have got to be brought home.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I suppose they would be brought home in an orderly and systematic fashion.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Now, let me continue. Suppose when those terms of peace are signed they provide that Germany must evacuate Belgium before the terms of peace are settled, and it takes Germany three months to evacuate Belgium. Does the Senator think that the forces in the field should be disbanded until that act is performed? Certainly not. It is quite conceivable that the terms of peace will require 30 days, 60 days, 90 days, or even more to carry them into effect, and during that time no first-class power would permit the dissolution of its armies.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The Senator's illustration is, of course, apt in one sense and inapt in another. There never will be any peace until the Germans are driven out of Belgium. That goes without saying. Now, whatever the terms of peace, if they should involve the reformation of political conditions in the allied States of Europe, surely the men who enlisted for the war ought not to be held under any such elastic extension of their contracts. I would not subscribe to that at all.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. That is all I desire to provide for.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President——

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. That is one of the reasons why we opposed it in our naval bill. We did not hesitate at all to say that the emergency should be concluded with the end of the war and if we do not act now in some fashion some officer of the Government at the other end of the Capital is going to come down and tell us to take that out of the naval bill. Then we are committed to God knows how long a war.

Mr. PHELAN and Mr. HARDWICK addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I yield to the Senator from Georgia first, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Well, the Chair must maintain just a few of the functions of the Chair. Senators desiring to interrupt must address the Chair and get recognition of the Chair.

Mr. HARDWICK. I addressed the Chair, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Yes; but the Chair recognized the Senator from California.

Mr. HARDWICK. But I addressed the Chair first.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It has gone on for days here that the Senator occupying the floor just parcels it out as he pleases, without regard to the Chair. The Chair does not care anything about it.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, the Senator from Georgia addressed the Chair, and thought the Chair——

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is no doubt about that; but the Senator from California did, also.

Mr. HARDWICK. Well, the Senator from Georgia did first, although I yield to the Chair.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President, I desire to make a point of order. I think this matter should take the form of a joint resolution, and therefore make the point of order that it is legislation on an appropriation bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. In view of the discussion that was had on yesterday, and the general understanding that this matter was to be taken up and considered and no objection would be made, the Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I do.

Mr. HARDWICK. Suppose one of the conditions of this treaty of peace should be that we were to become a party to a world league to enforce peace, and were to furnish an army of, we will say for the purposes of this question, 200,000 men to help to do it. Would the Senator want the emergency to be extended so far that the men drafted for this war, as was contended here yesterday, could be kept in service against their will over there to help enforce peace throughout the world?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I understand the Senator's question now, and I would answer that unqualifiedly no; and I am perfectly willing to accept the amendment the Senator from Georgia himself has suggested or the one which the Senator from Colorado has suggested, that the bill should remain in force not longer than six months after the conclusion of peace. That will leave a leeway which might be 30 days or 60 days or 90 days.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I do.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I wanted to make a suggestion to the Senator from Nebraska, and also to the Senator from Georgia who introduced this amendment. In the bill as it was passed by the Senate originally, section 8a contained a provision which I think was very well considered and very well worded and would meet every objection that has been raised here and could be added to this bill instead of the amendment offered by the Senator from Georgia, if it met the approval of Senators, by a very slight change. I have slightly modified it, and will read it to the Senate, with the permission of the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. On what page?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. It is on page 29 of the bill as it passed the Senate.

That the service of all persons selected by draft under the provisions of the act entitled "An act to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States" shall be for the period of the war, unless sooner terminated by discharge or otherwise. Whenever said war shall cease by the conclusion of peace between the United States and its enemies in the present war the President shall so declare by a public proclamation to that effect, and from and after the date of said proclamation the provisions of this act, in so far as they authorize compulsory service by selective draft or otherwise, shall cease to be in force and effect.

That leaves it entirely with the President, by withholding the issuing of such proclamation if the troops are required to be there any length of time after the war, to determine that length of time by the date of the proclamation.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I think not, Mr. President.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Very well. I just made that as a suggestion, thinking it might be a solution.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I think the Senator from Wisconsin will realize that when nations have signed a treaty of peace it then becomes the duty of the executive in each country to issue a proclamation to that effect; and the courts in our country decided after the Civil War that the war lasts until the proclamation of peace is issued. Now, so far as I am concerned, I am perfectly willing to accept the amendment which has been suggested by the Senator from Colorado to the amendment of the Senator from Georgia, that the period after the conclusion of the war during which this act shall remain in force shall not exceed six months; but I certainly think either that should be done or the word "emergency" should be continued in use.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, it seems to me that any objection to this amendment at this time is little short of bad faith.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I do not want to be charged with bad faith. The only agreement made in the Senate yesterday was that no point of order should be raised to this proposition. We did not say that we would not discuss it or consider it upon its merits.

Mr. REED. Everybody knows that the bill would not have gone through yesterday if it had not been understood that this amendment would be put on the present bill. The question was a serious one. We had debated the matter in the Senate. We had arranged a language that suited the Senate, and it was a language which insured the discharge of these troops, and it was stricken out in conference. The Senate had it in its power yesterday to send that bill back to the conferees and instruct the Senate conferees to insist upon the proposition that the Senate had made. Thereupon a long colloquy took place, in which the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] repeatedly stated in substance that he would not waive the right to insist then and there upon writing into the military bill language which would protect against the wrong which was feared, unless it was fully understood and agreed that an amendment expressing a construction of the language, such an amendment as he has now presented, should be accepted. It was not a question that the point of order would not be made, because the point of order can not be made anyway. As the Vice President stated, the bill that is now before us is not a regular appropriation bill. It is a bill full of legislation.

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. REED. I do.

Mr. MARTIN. I do not know that it is of any particular importance, but I have not understood the Vice President to decide that this was not a regular appropriation bill. He expressed some doubt about it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair did not decide that question.

Mr. MARTIN. It has not been decided by the Chair.

Mr. REED. It may not have been decided formally, but in the reasoning which the Vice President employed he stated pretty clearly what I have stated. That was not the point. The point was that it was to go on, not that we were to have a four days' battle over it here.

Now, I want to submit to those who are alarmed, especially the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK], that he need not be alarmed about this matter; nobody needs get frightened about it. Nobody needs get alarmed lest these 500,000 or 1,000,000 men that we are going to draft should be discharged while they are over in Europe and while the emergency still exists. If these men were volunteers, and in volunteering had made a contract with the Government to serve for three months, for six months, or for the period of the war, and we had a contractual relation with them which they would be entitled to hold us to, then in making this statute, which would be a part of that contract, we might have to be very careful; but this is not that kind of proposition. Congress, by its ipse dixit, says to these men, "You shall serve." It can say to them now, "You shall serve for six months," and at the end of six months it can say, "You shall serve for six months longer," and at the end of that period it can pass another act saying, "You shall serve for six years longer."

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President——

Mr. REED. We are taking men here by force of law. We are drafting them. We are not asking their consent. Therefore there is no necessity to get alarmed; because if we make peace, and we have troops over in Europe, and it is necessary to keep the troops over in Europe, all we have to do is to pass a statute extending the period of this forced service—for these men are on forced service—and the same power that forces them in can force them to stay in. Now, of course, that does not apply to the militia, and it does not apply to the Regular Army, because they are not forced in.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. They are enlisted for the war.

Mr. REED. But if we allow the language to remain as it will be when the amendment of the Senator from Georgia is adopted, if it is adopted, there will still be 500,000 men left to close up the business; and we can say to those 500,000 men, by a new act, "You shall stay." But the difference is this: It will require a new act of Congress at that time. It may require it; and in the name of justice, why should not that be required? Why should these men be taken from their homes now for the indefinite period of the war, and then have a further indefinite period of forced service without action of Congress? If such an emergency arises as the Senator from Nebraska fears, all that Congress will have to do will be to say to these conscripts, "We just conscript you for three or four or five or six months longer." There is nothing, therefore, in the point.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. REED. Yes.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Senator has stated that there was a tacit agreement here yesterday that the amendment of the Senator from Georgia should be incorporated in the bill. I think not; but if he is correct, I want to call his attention to the fact that the amendment which the Senator from Georgia offered for incorporation in the bill yesterday reads as follows:

That the language "existing emergency" or "emergency" used in the act passed at the present session of Congress entitled "An act to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States" is hereby declared to mean the emergency caused by the war with Germany.

Now, I am for that amendment.

Mr. REED. Very well; that is all I want.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. But the amendment has now been changed. As presented by the Senator from Georgia, the language is changed.

Mr. REED. Let me say before I leave my feet that I do not want the Senator from Nebraska to think that I charged him with bad faith personally. I simply was referring to the general situation, and regretting that debate and opposition should now arise. I was not referring to the Senator's action, of course.

Before I leave the floor, I simply want to repeat my statement. Can not anybody here see that as we have conscripted these men for the period of the war, if at the time we declare peace it is necessary to hold them three or six months longer, a new act of Congress could conscript them for that period and extend their period of service? But it would require an act of Congress if the amendment of the Senator from Georgia is accepted. It would not leave it absolutely in the hands of the military authorities to do with as they pleased. That is a very important distinction to the poor fellow who is being taken from his home and sent there against his will, perhaps, at the present time.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. REED. I was going to yield the floor. I will answer a question if the Senator wants to ask it of me. If not, I will sit down and yield the floor.

Mr. NORRIS. It was not in the nature of a question; but I wanted to suggest that while my colleague [Mr. HITCHCOCK] has read the amendment as it was first offered, I think the Senator from Georgia yesterday modified his amendment on an objection that was made to the very language that my colleague quotes. I want to ask the Senator from Georgia if that is not true, and if he is not offering it this morning in exactly the same form as it was practically agreed upon yesterday?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes. I first offered it with the words "the emergency caused by" in it, and that language was objected to and I struck it out.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; that was objected to.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. So I struck it out and made it read, "is hereby declared to mean the war with Germany."

Mr. NORRIS. So that the form——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. So that the form which I understood was acceptable to the Senate yesterday, and which I therefore offered this morning, was:

The language * * * used * * * is hereby declared to mean the war with Germany.

Mr. NORRIS. That is my recollection, that it was finally practically agreed upon in that form. While I did not vote for the conference report yesterday, I was very much impressed with the argument that was made by several Senators as to this particular change, and it was the reason why I voted against the conference report—because I thought that was sufficiently important so that it ought to be put in, and it seems to me that we ought to put it in in the form in which it was practically agreed upon yesterday.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I offer the following as a substitute for the amendment offered by the Senator from Georgia:

That the services of all persons selected by draft and all volunteers enlisted under the provisions of the act entitled "An act to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States" shall be for the period of the war unless sooner terminated by discharge or otherwise. Whenever said war shall cease by the conclusion of peace between the United States and its enemies in the present war, the President shall so declare by a public proclamation to that effect, and within four months after the date of said proclamation the provisions of this act, in so far as they authorize compulsory service by selective draft or otherwise, shall cease to be of force and effect.

Mr. President, this amendment merely includes all of the forces that go into or are added to the present Military Establishment, and then it changes the amendment that the Senate has already agreed to only to meet the objection offered by the Senator from Nebraska as to the time of disbanding the troops. That is arranged in this way: "Within four months," instead of having it immediately upon the termination of the war. I hope the Senator from Georgia will accept that.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Will the Senator read it once more?

Mr. McKELLAR. I will take great pleasure in doing so. By the way, let me explain I am reading from the amendment that the Senate has already agreed to, with some interlineations to which I will call attention.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Section 8a with a few modifications.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Let me call the Senator's attention to the fact that when he talks about "a period within four months" and "the provisions of this act" he says he is contemplating putting that on another bill.

Mr. McKELLAR. Oh, no; within four months after the date of said proclamation. I will read it again so that Senators can see exactly what it is:

That the service of all persons selected by draft and all volunteers enlisted under the provisions of the act entitled "An act to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States," shall be for the period of the war, unless sooner terminated by discharge or otherwise. Whenever said war shall cease by the conclusion of peace between the United States and its enemies in the present war the President shall so declare by a public proclamation to that effect, and within four months—

Now, that is substituted for the words "from and after"— and within four months after the date of said proclamation the provisions of this act, in so far as they authorize compulsory service by selective draft or otherwise, shall cease to be of force and effect.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Should it not be "provisions of said act"?

Mr. NORRIS. Certainly, it should.

Mr. McKELLAR. "Of said act." The Senator is entirely right about that.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. "Of said act." It has already described the act fully.

Mr. McKELLAR. I offer that as a substitute.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Tennessee offers a substitute, which will be read.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I think that is clearly what those of us who insisted upon the provision wanted. It allows but four months, and barring four months clearly covers the question. If others who are interested in it do not object, I shall not.

Mr. NORRIS. I have no objection to it, I will state to the Senator.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Georgia accepts it, and, without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. REED. I have not heard it. I just came into the Chamber. I was called out.

Mr. McKELLAR. If the Secretary will pass it to me I will read it again or I will pass it to the Senator from Missouri to read.

Mr. REED (after examining the amendment). I do not think it is quite right yet, because the Senator uses the term "all volunteers enlisted under the provisions of the act and all drafted." Now, there is another class of men who are enlisted. You do not call them volunteers. The men who are now joining the Regular Army, the men who are now joining the Marine Corps, are enlisted men, but they are not what are commonly called volunteers. The men who are now joining are not of a class who are going into the profession of soldiers. They are a class of men who are enlisting because of the war. I should think the amendment ought to say, "and men enlisting in any branch of the service."

For instance, there was a young man in my office yesterday whose father is a millionaire and who is a college graduate. He came down here hoping to have an opportunity to enter the officers' school, and, finding that full, he informed me yesterday that he was going to enlist as a private in the Marine Corps. He is enlisting because there is a war and impelled only by patriotic motives. I want this language so that when this war is over that young man may get out. I understand the reason why we have been getting so many enlistments in the Regular Army and Marine Corps, and so readily, is because instead of being required to enlist for seven years they have been told that their enlistment would be construed to be an enlistment for the war. So I think we ought to put in that language.

Mr. McKELLAR. I will say to the Senator they can only be enlisted under the provisions of this act, and this would apply to every man who is enlisted under this act; but it would not do to put all the men who are in the Regular service out of the service at the end of the war. We would have no army whatsoever if that should be done. Instead of using "volunteers," I will use the word "enlistment."

Mr. REED. That would be all right.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, this is a most amazing proposition. We are proposing here in this paragraph to change the laws of the United States with regard to enlistment. The only agreement we reached yesterday was to affect men who are compelled to go to this war, and it is a plain violation of that agreement that the Senator has been talking about. This is intended only to cover the cases of men taken by compulsion under the draft, and now the Senator is seeking on this proposition to amend the enlistment laws of the United States. The chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs is not here; I am only acting in his absence. I think it is a most remarkable proposition to make such a vital change.

Mr. WARREN. I wish to say to the Senator from Tennessee that I am sure on reflection he will not want to use the word "enlistment," generally, because that goes to the very root of the Regular Army.

Mr. McKELLAR. I do not think there is any intention to interfere with the Regular Army in any way in the world.

Mr. WARREN. Then leave your amendment as it is.

Mr. McKELLAR. I have not yet put in that word.

Mr. REED. Does the Senator mean to state that the men who are now enlisting in the Regular Army are not doing it with the assurance that their term of enlistment will be limited to this war?

Mr. WARREN. The enlistment for a certain specified term of service has gone along under the laws as they are now and have been and are for a longer time of service than in the proposed new law, and are so understood. As to those who enlist for a temporary organization, that is another thing.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. All enlistments under the act that we passed yesterday are for the emergency.

Mr. WARREN. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. And none who enlist under the provisions of the emergency act are under the general law.

Mr. WARREN. I do not understand even then why the additional language is necessary.

I made no comment when the committee amendment was read, because I thought there was nothing objectionable to it. The second insertion of the word "enlistment" makes it inclusive. Old organizations are being filled for longer service. These men have made longer contracts and they will, of course, stand by them, and when the new law is passed new contracts are made. They will all agree, probably, and it will be for the emergency only.

Mr. McKELLAR. I will say to the Senator that so far as I am concerned, my own purpose was that it should apply only to all persons drafted or volunteering or enlisted, whichever you may call it, under the terms of the act that we passed finally yesterday.

Mr. WARREN. That covers all that it is necessary to cover.

Mr. McKELLAR. That is why it was not my intention to recur to the Regular Establishment at all, and I think it would be wiser.

Mr. REED. The very fact that the Senator from Wyoming raises this point makes me all the more earnest about it.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Will the Senator just allow me a moment?

That the service of all persons selected by draft or enlistment under the provisions of an act entitled "An act to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States"—

And so forth.

It is only enlistments under this temporary act. It applies solely to the temporary enlistment and fixes the time when the temporary enlistment ceases. I do think that ought to be satisfactory to everybody, since we have extended it four months after the close of the war.

Mr. McKELLAR. I think it will be satisfactory.

Mr. WARREN. I do not think it is necessary, and it will be cleaner cut if the amendment is taken as the Senator had it formerly.

Mr. McKELLAR. I hope the Senator from Wyoming will not object to it because I really believe it will settle the difficulty; it will mean what we all desire, and that is to have it apply to soldiers coming in under this act.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Let me call attention to this fact: There are a number of men who are applying and taking examiantions for first and second lieutenants in the Regular Army. Under the bill passed yesterday they are enlisting for the war. They do not go permanently into the service of the United States.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes.

Mr. WADSWORTH. When men apply for commissions and receive the commissions the commission is for life or good behavior.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The Senator is mistaken. They are taking them now under the law for the war and under this emergency. Provision has been made for their appointment for the emergency and not for life.

Mr. WADSWORTH. A commission in the officers' reserve list is a permanent commission. The man on accepting that commission holds himself in readiness to be summoned to active duty at any time. He may resign and his resignation be accepted.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The Senator is mistaken. A commission in the Officers' Reserve Corps is not for life, but under the provision of the bill passed yesterday is during the emergency.

Mr. WARREN. Will the Senator read the first part of it?

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I rise to a point of order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Iowa will state it.

Mr. KENYON. I ask to have the first clause of Rule XIX read to the Senate. It has been violated twenty times in the last 10 minutes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read.

The Secretary read as follows:

RULE XIX.

1. When a Senator desires to speak, he shall rise and address the Presiding Officer, and shall not proceed until he is recognized, and the Presiding Officer shall recognize the Senator who shall first address him. No Senator shall interrupt another Senator in debate without his consent, and to obtain such consent he shall first address the Presiding Officer; and no Senator shall speak more than twice upon any one question in debate on the same day without leave of the Senate, which shall be determined without debate.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I submit there are some Senators who have spoken five times on this question without addressing the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will have to sustain the point of order.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I think I addressed the Chair when interrupting the Senator from Tennessee. I was about to read the language as the Senator from Tennessee has offered it:

That the service of all persons selected by draft and all volunteers enlisted under the provisions of the act entitled "An act to increase"—

And so forth, giving the name of the act—shall be for the period of the war unless sooner terminated.

I do not see that anything could be added to that to make it stronger. That does not include commissioned officers, of course, but it takes in volunteers and drafted men.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I have no objection to the amendment suggested by the Senator from Georgia, which is to strike out of the substitute "volunteers and enlisted" and insert in lieu thereof the word "enlistments." I have no objection to it, and I accept it. I ask that it may be made a part of my amendment.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I am willing to accept that as a substitute for the amendment I offered.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I ask that the amendment as finally prepared may be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will report the amendment.

The SECRETARY. Add at the end of the bill a new section, as follows:

SEC. 4. That the service of all persons selected by draft and all enlistments under the provision of the act entitled "An act to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States" shall be for the period of the war, unless sooner terminated by discharge or otherwise. Whenever said war shall cease by the conclusion of peace between the United States and its enemies in the present war, the President shall so declare by a public proclamation to that effect, and within four months after the date of said proclamation the provisions of said act, in so far as they authorize compulsory service by selective draft or otherwise, shall cease to be of force and effect.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I shall be exceedingly brief in my remarks upon this amendment. As I tried to point out yesterday just before the Senate adjourned, it is absolutely impossible for the Congress at this time to prophecy what the conditions will be at the conclusion of the war. The mere conclusion of the war may not end the emergency. We can not tell what will be the terms of the treaty of peace.

This amendment apparently would effect a very general disbandment of the Army of the United States within four months after the termination of the war, though I think the disbandment provision is confined to that portion of the Army which shall be recruited under the selective draft——

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. "Or otherwise."

Mr. WADSWORTH. I may be mistaken in that, and if so, the situation will be the more serious.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. "Or otherwise." It will include all the Army.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, if the war continues two or three years, and if we engage in it to the limit of our strength, as we undoubtedly would under those circumstances, that portion of the Army of the United States which will be recruited by the selective draft will be by far the larger portion.

I ask the Senate to consider this phase of the question. We will say, for example, that the war has come to a conclusion with a very large American Army in the field, and the terms of the treaty of peace have been agreed upon by the representatives of the belligerent powers. Does Congress want to put it into the minds of our adversaries while they are discussing the terms of that peace that the American Army is to be disbanded, in any event, within four months after the treaty is signed?

Mr. McKELLAR and Mr. REED addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HARDWICK in the chair). Does the Senator yield and to whom?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield to the Senator from Tennessee for a question.

Mr. McKELLAR. The amendment does not provide for any such thing. It provides that the disbandment shall only take place within four months after the proclamation of peace by the President is made, so that the situation the Senator refers to could not exist under the amendment.

Mr. WADSWORTH. As to the effect of the language I am not so sure. The President of the United States, in compliance with the spirit of this amendment, I believe, would feel called upon to declare the termination of the war when the terms of peace have been settled upon by the representatives of the belligerent nations. I can not see how he could avoid issuing such a proclamation, and it is entirely proper that he should as soon as war has ceased; but I am inclined to believe that while the terms of peace were being discussed, before the war had actually come to a conclusion, but was about to reach a conclusion, this very act of Congress which would provide that within four months from that date there would be no American Army, would influence the deliberations of the council. Mr. President, I do not believe that it is wise to place a definite limitation upon the length or duration of the emergency. The terms of peace themselves might require specifically or make it a matter of military necessity for the maintenance of the American Army for longer than four months. This administration and this Congress can not make up its mind upon that question until the terms of peace have all been actually agreed upon.

It seems to me it is perfectly safe for us to leave the language as it is in the bill which passed yesterday, in order, when the time comes, that the administration and the Congress—and Congress is not going to be deprived of any power at that time—can determine whether or not the emergency or any portion or phase of the emergency is still in existence. If we say now by an act of Congress that the emergency shall not be deemed to continue for more than four months after the cessation of hostilities, we are gambling with the future of which we know absolutely nothing.

A discussion was had a few moments ago as to the power of Congress in this respect, and, as I recall it, one of the Senators suggested that if when that time came and peace had been declared and this four months' limitation of the emergency proved to be too short a period, Congress could change its mind and extend the limitation beyond four months or indefinitely; but I desire to call the attention of the Senate to this: It is infinitely more difficult to pass an act of Congress and to adjust the public psychology to the passage of such an act which will increase the term of enlistment or increase the degree of obligation held by a million or two million soldiers than it is to reduce the term of enlistment or to terminate or reduce the degree of obligation. For one, I would rather have the language left as it is.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I merely wish to conclude this part of the statement.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New York declines to yield.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Only for the moment.

I would prefer that the language be left as it is, describing it as "the existing emergency"; and if later on, after the conclusion of peace, the Congress makes up its mind that the administration should disband the Army or reduce it, or should make up its mind that the emergency has ceased or has decreased in degree, the Congress can direct the President to disband or reduce the Army. That is a much more easy procedure than directing, in case of necessity, the President to extend the period or to lengthen the term of service or to increase the degree of obligation held by these millions of men. I call that to the attention of the Senate. If, perhaps, two years or three years from now, with this amendment adopted, we shall be faced with just such a situation, it will be a much more difficult situation than the one which would confront us if the words "existing emergency" are allowed to stand in the law.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, the main point made by the Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] is that we might be obliged to disband a greater part of our Army, which he states will be conscripts, pending the settlement of peace, and that because of that weakness, that liability to disbandment, we might find some difficulty in making our bargain for peace. That is the substance of the Senator's argument; but observe the language of the amendment. When I read the language of the amendment it is so complete an answer that I do not intend to comment on it:

> That the services of all persons selected by draft and all enlisted under the provisions of the act entitled "An act to temporarily increase the Military Establishment," shall be for the period of the war, unless sooner terminated by discharge or otherwise. Whenever said war shall cease by the conclusion of peace between the United States and its enemies in the present war the President shall so declare by a public proclamation to that effect, and within four months after the date of said proclamation the provisions of said act, in so far as they authorize compulsory service by selective draft or otherwise, shall cease to be in force and effect.

What becomes of the Senator's argument in view of that language?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. REED. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. Let me make a suggestion to the Senator from Missouri. The German troops occupied France or a portion of France, as my recollection is, for some two years after the conclusion of peace between France and Germany in 1871, until France had complied with the terms of the treaty.

Mr. REED. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. Is it not possible that the treaty of peace may prescribe that certain things shall be done by the Germans pursuant to its terms, and is it not within the line of possibility, not to say of probability, that it will be desirable to keep the Army in the field until compliance has been had? For instance, it is most sincerely hoped that one of the terms of peace will be a general disarmament and disbandment of great military forces. It might be desirable to keep an army in the field until terms of peace of that character might be complied with.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, that is entirely a different question. The question I am discussing for the instant is the argument of the Senator from New York that we may have our terms of peace interfered with because our Army will be disbanded before peace terms are actually signed. That is answered by the language of the amendment, which is, that the Army shall not be disbanded, unless voluntarily disbanded, until denced by the proclamation of the President, who, of course, four months after the conclusion of peace and that fact is evi- will not proclaim peace until peace has been achieved.

Mr. WADSWORTH rose.

Mr. REED. Does the Senator from New York desire to interrupt me?

Mr. WADSWORTH. After the Senator has concluded, I desire to say a word.

Mr. REED. Very well. Of course the President is not going to proclaim that peace has been achieved until the treaty of peace has been signed. To do so would be to do an absolutely foolish thing and an untruthful thing, for peace can not be said to have been achieved until the parties to the war have come to terms of agreement.

Now, answering the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH], the very observation he makes is one of the reasons why I insist that this amendment must be adopted. It is quite conceivable that out of this war may grow conditions which will compel us to maintain in Europe a large standing army for a long period of time. What those conditions or emergencies may be no man can prophesy. There may be men connected with the Military Establishment who will think that it is necessary to have the entire million men whom we may draft, or the two million or five million men whom we may draft, kept over in Europe for an indefinite period. It was the purpose of those of us who insisted on writing the language in the bill which was stricken out of the bill, and which provided that the term of the drafted men should terminate with the war, to prevent just such a condition and to make it so that no military officer could hold these boys, who are taken involuntarily from their homes, and keep them in Europe for an indefinite period, to render an indefinite service after hostilities have terminated. The more illustrations there are of that kind the more determined I feel that this amendment ought to be accepted.

But now I call the attention of the Senator from Montana to this fact: It is conceded that if we act under the present military bill in raising our forces the greater part of our troops will be drafted men. If they are, then we will have over in Europe enormous forces of drafted men.

Mr. President, I understand the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] desires to offer an amendment, and, while it is out of order, I understand he has to take a train, and I pause in order that he may submit his amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If the Senator from Missouri yields the floor, the Chair will recognize him again.

Mr. REED. I yield the floor for that purpose.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Jersey is recognized.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I thank the Senator from Missouri for his courtesy. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk, which I understand is satisfactory to the chairman of the committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Jersey offers an amendment, which the Secretary will state.

The SECRETARY. On page 61, line 7, it is proposed to strike out "$150,000" and to insert in lieu thereof "$325,000."

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. President, that item has been duly estimated for; I think it is necessary, and I will be very glad, so far as I am concerned, to have it go into the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I notice that the amendment comes under the head of aviation, and that it increases the amount appropriated for the purchase of land. I should like to ask the Senator from New Jersey if the department has any particular piece of land in view in asking this increase of $175,000 over the amount carried in the bill?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. It has. The $175,000 increase is for the purchase of an aviation field at Cape May, N. J., which the Navy Department desires to acquire. The matter came to me through my colleague [Mr. HUGHES] who had taken the question up. I visited the Navy Department and the Secretary of the Navy wrote a letter to the chairman of the committee urging that this item be included. It does not increase the total amount of the appropriation in that paragraph, but increases the amount of this particular item from $150,000 to $325,000.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator means that it does not increase the amount of the appropriation of $11,000,000 for the purposes of aviation, but that it does increase the amount made available for the purchase of land?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Yes.

Mr. SMOOT. Does the Senator from Virginia state that the department has brought this matter to the attention of the committee?

Mr. MARTIN. The Secretary of the Navy has written a letter urging that this be done.

Mr. SMOOT. I have no objection to the amendment.

Mr. REED. I am not going to object to the amendment at this time, but I may do so later.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from New Jersey.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I was about through with what I was going to say. I want, however, to say to the Senator from Montana that it is conceded now that the great bulk of the troops which we may have in Europe when peace is absolutely concluded and when the President may issue his proclamation of peace will be drafted men. The Government has no contract with those men; they did not come in and volunteer upon certain terms and conditions, but the Government took them, and if some special emergency should exist making it necessary to keep a part of those troops in Europe, surely the Congress at that time can be counted upon to extend the term of service, and surely Congress has the right to extend the term of service, because it has the right to force them into the service originally. That, however, would require an act of Congress, and to that extent it would safeguard these men against what otherwise might be a great wrong. Some regiment or two regiments or half a dozen regiments might be kept indefinitely, just as we find to-day that the greater part of the troops that were sent to the Mexican border were returned to their homes, but some regiments have been kept there. I am not saying that at all in the way of criticism, but it serves to illustrate how, in withdrawing our troops from Europe, once they are there, there may be regiments left indefinitely, unless, under the terms of an act of Congress, their period of service be terminated. Of course if it is necessary to keep some of them there, and that matter is laid before Congress at that time, Congress can extend the term of service; but, surely, in extending the term of service it will have some regard to the equities as they may then exist.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, it seems to me that this whole discussion has reached the point where it is now plain we can find no better words, no apter words, than those used in the conscription bill itself, namely, "the existing emergency," as governing the period of service of the forces to be drafted. What is the "existing emergency"? I ask Senators to have in mind the amendment as originally proposed by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] in which he confined the emergency to the war with Germany. Mr. President, the quite obvious "existing emergency" is the war with Germany, but something else is involved in the present war with Germany which may be well included under the term "existing emergency." Germany has her allies. Austria-Hungary, Bulgaria, and Turkey are her allies. They may make war against the United States, either one or all of them, as allies of Germany. To say, as was originally proposed, that the draft shall be for the war with Germany would be too limited. We should, therefore, consider a war with Austria or a war with Turkey or Bulgaria more than a possibility and properly covered by the term "existing emergency"; and the term should be broad enough to include conditions like these.

Reference has been made to conditions when the war is over, or the actual fighting is over, and the terms of peace may be agreed upon. These are weighty considerations. The necessity of establishing peace on a firm basis, of seeing that the terms of the treaty are complied with in regard to Belgium, Roumania, or Serbia, for example, may be considered as a part of the emergency. And thus we see the difficulty in trying to fix a definite time in this bill within which the Army may be disbanded, and yet all would properly come from conditions arising out of the obviously existing emergency, which is the war with Germany.

I think, Mr. President, that this whole discussion simply demonstrates that we can use no better term than the original term used in the conscription bill itself, "existing emergency"; and I have no fear that the administration, the executive department, or any court would interpret the term "existing emergency" to mean more than the present war with Germany or the conditions growing immediately out of it, including, of course, the fact that Germany has her allies in this war who may make war upon the United States.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I only desire to say that had it not been understood yesterday that we were to have this limitation restored in this way the conference report on the Army bill that was agreed to yesterday would still be before the Senate for discussion.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, may I say a word in reply to the Senator from Georgia upon that particular point? I did not know that it was understood that any such amendment was to be incorporated in any subsequent appropriation bill or other bill to be brought before the Senate. I understood that the Senator from Georgia expressed the hope—and that was as far as he went—that such an amendment might be incorporated in another bill.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, while there was no promise made, and could not have been, that the Senator from Georgia would submit this amendment and that it would be agreed to, yet those of us who were here generally understood that the Senator would have the privilege of offering the amendment and that it would probably be agreed to; that was all.

Mr. President, this is an important matter. Many Senators are at the Office Building who do not get here when a vote is taken without a call of the roll; and I ask that the roll be called.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Hampshire suggests the absence of a quorum. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

I also desire to announce that the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS] is detained from the Senate on official business and is paired with the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN]. I ask that this announcement may stand for the day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-nine Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] as modified by the proposal of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR].

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I simply want to state that my recollection of what happened yesterday afternoon is not that there was any agreement to this amendment, but that the author of the amendment, the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] stated:

I am not sure that this amendment could be offered over objection.

And then, later on, the Vice President stated:

The Chair hears no objection to the amendment and assumes no point of order will be raised against the amendment as presented by the Senator from Georgia.

I think that was all the agreement there was among the Senators who were present, that no one who was present would raise the point of order; but I had expected that I could be allowed to vote on the merits of the amendment, and so understand now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on the amendment of the Senator from Georgia as modified.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I should like to have the amendment stated as it has been modified.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will again state the amendment, without objection.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add, at the end of the bill, a new section, to be known as section 4, as follows:

That the service of all persons selected by draft and all enlistments under the provisions of the act entitled "An act to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States" shall be for the period of the war, unless sooner terminated by discharge or otherwise. Whenever said war shall cease by the conclusion of peace between the United States and its enemies in the present war, the President shall so declare by a public proclamation to that effect, and within four months after the date of said proclamation the provisions of said act, in so far as they authorize compulsory service by selective draft or otherwise, shall cease to be of force and effect.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment which has just been stated by the Secretary.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. President, I have some amendments that I desire to offer to perfect the next clause in this bill. I send the first one to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Virginia proposes an amendment, which will be stated by the Secretary.

The SECRETARY. On page 2, line 22, after the word "now," it is proposed to insert the words "constructed or."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MARTIN. I send another amendment to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Virginia proposes an amendment, which will be stated by the Secretary.

The SECRETARY. On page 3, line 6, before the period at the end of the line, it is proposed to insert:

Provided, That this appropriation may be reimbursed from available funds under the War and Navy Departments for vessels turned over for the exclusive use of those departments, or either of them.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MARTIN. I send another amendment to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Virginia offers an amendment, which will be stated by the Secretary.

The SECRETARY. On page 3, line 14, after the words "United States," it is proposed to insert:

Except those acquired for the Army or Navy.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MARTIN. Another one, on page 6.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Virginia offers an amendment, which will be stated by the Secretary.

The SECRETARY. On page 6, after line 3, it is proposed to insert as a separate paragraph the following:

(e) To purchase, requisition, and take over for use or operation by the United States any vessel or floating small craft now constructed, or any part thereof, at such reasonable price as shall be determined by the President.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I will ask the Senator from Virginia if the President is going to be the sole arbiter as to what price shall be allowed for these vessels belonging to private parties?

Mr. MARTIN. There is a provision here that he must buy them at a fair price, and if there is a disagreement about it the courts will have to settle it.

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes; they can go to the courts and possibly get a judgment, and then Congress will have to act upon it. Those of us who have had some experience in trying to get legislation of this kind through know how hopeless it is, as a rule; but I do not know that there is any remedy. It certainly looks, however, as though it is rather an extraordinary thing to put in the hands of the President the power to commandeer all the vessels, small craft, and yachts of the country, and pay such compensation as he sees fit to pay, and that the owner has no redress except that he can go to the courts.

Mr. MARTIN. The owner has redress. If the owner is not satisfied, he can take the matter into court.

Mr. GALLINGER. Why, certainly; I understand that; but the Senator is too experienced a legislator to argue that that is any great comfort to the owner.

Mr. MARTIN. But, Mr. President, somebody must have the power. To whom would the Senator give this power? The President, of course, will readily act through advisers that he will consider skilled in this business, and we must give the power somewhere.

Mr. GALLINGER. To give an offhand opinion, I will say that I should think those matters might be adjusted between the Shipping Board and the owners of these vessels. I think to have this entirely one sided, and to have the private citizen have no redress, is a pretty drastic way of dealing with a business proposition. That is my judgment.

Mr. MARTIN. It is provided in another place in the bill that if the owner is not satisfied he can take the matter into court, and he shall be paid one-half of the price that is offered, and it shall be adjusted by the decision of the court.

Mr. GALLINGER. I replied to that a moment ago. I have been interested in some bills that have been before the court where the private citizen has been clearly entitled to compensation, but he never gets it. The court finds the facts and sends the finding to Congress, and Congress says, "This is an old claim, and we will pay no attention to it."

Now, as I said a moment ago, I do not know that there is any redress. I presume we are going to turn over pretty much everything to the President of the United States to do as he pleases. I think it is a dangerous situation for the country to get into, and I think it ought to be halted at some time, in some way, so that the private citizen would have an opportunity at least to present his side of the case and have an arbitration or an adjustment between the two sides to the controversy.

Now, we have created this Shipping Board. We are going to give them $750,000,000, more or less; and it does seem to me that matters of this kind might well be placed in the hands of that board to deal with the private citizen in a matter of importance to the citizen.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I wish to ask the chairman a question in connection with the amendment. I thought the provision in the bill as reported by the committee really covered this proposition until further examination convinced me that it did not. It has just been called to my attention that it is required 50 per cent shall be paid to the owner of any property taken. That is a very small percentage of the value of the property that may be taken and it ought to be increased. I merely wish to ask the chairman of the committee whether he will have any objection to changing the 50 per cent to, say, 75 per cent of the value fixed by the President? That would enable the people whose property is taken to go on with the business in a much better condition than they could with a 50 per cent allowance. Of course, that was the amount put in the naval bill, but that was put in hurriedly.

Mr. MARTIN. The naval act covered the same point, and, so far as the Navy was concerned, fixed it at 50 per cent.

Mr. JONES of Washington. That is true.

Mr. MARTIN. That seemed to be reasonable, but if the Senator insists on making it 75 per cent, although I do not believe it is necessary, I will agree to it.

Mr. SHAFROTH. When the Government has to get anything it has to pay big prices, and I believe when there is a right to sue the Government for the amount of money they will get a large sum. If we fix it at 75 per cent, and fix it at the purchaser's price——

Mr. JONES of Washington. Oh, no; it is fixed by the President, not at the purchaser's price at all.

Mr. SHAFROTH. It seems to me that 50 per cent is sufficient.

Mr. MARTIN. As far as I am concerned, I am willing to have it fixed at 75 per cent.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I do not want to take more time, and I am not going to do so; but I wish to say as the value is to be fixed by the President himself, what steps he may take to ascertain what it is I do not know. I am not going into that at all; but the President fixes the value. I think it is safe to assume that he will not fix a value beyond what is reasonable. If that is the case, what objection can there be to paying to the owner whose property is taken arbitrarily 75 per cent? I think it would be perfectly safe, and that we really ought to give the owner more, that we ought to give him 90 per cent, but I am only suggesting 75 per cent because I think there can not be any reasonable objection made to that.

I wish to state to the chairman that I expect to offer an amendment, and I would be much more satisfied with the amendment the Senator now proposes if he would make it 75 per cent.

Mr. MARTIN. I am perfectly willing to make it 75 per cent.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Virginia can modify his proposal.

Mr. MARTIN. It does not come in at this place, but at another place in the bill, to which I will call the attention of the Senate later.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I am very much gratified to have the Senator from Virginia agree to a modification of his amendment, as suggested by the Senator from Washington. My judgment is, as the Senator from Washington has suggested, that it might well be 90 per cent. It must be remembered that many of these vessels will be in trade; that the owner will be earning his living by operating the vessels; and they are arbitrarily taken from him, and he is paid a part of the compensation determined by the President without any reference to his views on the subject. So I think he ought to be paid reasonably near the full amount that the President fixes. But I shall raise no further objection in view of the fact that the Senator from Virginia has agreed that it shall be 75 per cent.

Mr. MARTIN. That will be entirely satisfactory to me.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. This does not relate to the pending amendment.

Mr. MARTIN. It is entirely separate. I will call attention to the place where it comes in.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, I would like to have the amendment reported.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the amendment to the amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 6, after line 3, insert a separate paragraph, as follows:

(e) To purchase, requisition, and take over for use or operation by the United States any vessel or floating small craft now constructed, or any part thereof, at such reasonable price as shall be determined by the President.

Mr. WEEKS. Does that include small craft like tugs?

Mr. MARTIN. It would undoubtedly. That is one of the things the Navy Department say they may need and was one of the chief considerations that led to this amendment.

Mr. WEEKS. Is not that practically the proposition contained in the bill which has been offered by the Senator's colleague, which was presented yesterday to the Senate?

Mr. MARTIN. For naval purposes only; but it did not extend further than naval purposes. I understand this language was earnestly recommended by the department.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, I wish to make a few comments on that and on this whole proposition.

Undoubtedly the Navy may need, or they do need, tugs for certain definite purposes, but so do the commercial interests of the country need those tugs, and that is particularly applicable to the conditions which prevail in New England. If the entire railway facilities were used to carry coal into New England from the Pennsylvania and West Virginia coal regions they could not possibly carry coal enough to supply the needs of New England by something like two-fifths of the total amount required. The balance of that coal must go to tidewater.

This is an important subject, because it is absolutely fundamental in connection with our business operations. If you do not supply the New England community, for example, with sufficient coal to keep its factories in operation and to keep all the other great industrial organizations going, then we are going to have stagnation in business in that section, and it is going to be reflected in every part of the United States.

Not very long ago the Navy Department took over two or three tugs owned by the Reading Railroad; that is to say, they bought tugs that had been used exclusively in towing barges of coal to the New England or northern Atlantic coast region. There was a protest made by practically every user of coal in that region, not only to the administrative branch of the Government but to the Representatives in Congress, and they pointed out to what a degree even the taking of one tug from that service would affect the industrial situation in New England.

Are we going to deliberately turn over to the President—no; not to the President, but to some subordinate of the President—the possibility of producing stagnation in that great industrial field? Is it wise for us to say to somebody, and that somebody a subordinate not responsible to us, if you think there are necessities in some other direction, you may take the water craft which are used for these industrial purposes and divert them to some other purpose without taking into consideration at all the industrial purposes for which they are now being used.

It is a step fraught with a great deal of danger to our whole situation. If we are going to damage business and damage it in such a way as this, we will not be able to sell bonds or collect taxes. That one thing may have an effect on the entire operations of the Government in connection with prosecuting the war which would be almost beyond conception.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. WEEKS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Does not the Senator recognize that this power must be lodged somewhere, and does he not recognize that the President of the United States is interested in having all parts of the country in a prosperous condition and not cripple any part? Inasmuch as it must be left to somebody, it seems to me that the President is the proper party to whom to leave it, and to curb him or hinder him in the exercise of this war power would be a great detriment to the proper management of the war.

Mr. WEEKS. I am not criticizing the President. If the President had the time and the opportunity to investigate all the questions surrounding such a taking of water craft, I might say that is entirely satisfactory to me, but the President is not going to do it. It is going to be done, according to the proposition the Senator from Virginia has introduced, by the Navy Department. The Navy Department is not taking into consideration the commercial interests of the country. It is trying to make the Navy efficient, and it is going any length to take anything that it finds desirable for that purpose, without any regard as to how it is going to affect commerce. Therefore, I say, without any intention upon the part of anyone, we are putting a power in the hands of the department which may be used to seriously cripple the operations of the commerce of the United States.

Mr. MARTIN. If the Senator will excuse me, this power is given directly to the President; it is not given to the department.

Mr. WEEKS. The Senator knows the President is going to authorize the Navy Department to do what it thinks is necessary in this respect to properly prosecute the war. I understand they want to send these tugs to Great Britain to use them as mine sweepers or connected with mine sweeping, taking them entirely out of the coastwise service.

Only the other day there was a proposition to take one of the Delaware & Lackawanna tugs which was used for shifting purposes in New York Harbor. It was pointed out at the time what it would mean to the transportation interests of this country if even one tug were taken from New York Harbor; that it would tie up a large part of the shipping that is transferred there and seriously cripple the commercial operations of that great harbor.

Mr. MARTIN. Suppose we have troops on the line of battle in France, and they are short of ammunition or food. Does not the Senator think that the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States, the President, ought to have power, if he can not get them in any other way and if it is necessary, to commandeer ships to take food or munitions to American soldiers fighting on the line of battle in France?

Mr. WEEKS. It is quite likely that I would go as far as the Senator would in a matter of that kind, but tugs are not going to take food to Europe.

Mr. MARTIN. This is not limited to tugs. That is one thing it embraces.

Mr. WEEKS. I am talking about tugs, and that is my principal contention.

Mr. MARTIN. Fuel ships and tankers and all sorts of tugs are included when the absolute necessities of the Government require it, and if they can not be taken without commandeering, this gives the President the right to commandeer them and put them in the service of the United States; that is all.

Mr. WEEKS. If the power were limited to small craft and other vessels used for towing purposes, I would not have any objection to it. If it is water craft of any kind or craft used for any similar purpose, I think the power is quite reasonable; but I doubt if any Senator here has sufficient knowledge of the difference it would make to the commercial interests of the United States taking over even one tug to warrant his voting an omnibus proposition which would include such craft.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. My attention was diverted and I did not hear all the remarks the Senator made. I wish to ask him if he called attention to the fact that the New England manufacturers to a very large extent depend for their food supply upon coal barges.

Mr. WEEKS. I did call attention to it. I suppose that any authority which it is proposed to give the President in this emergency is likely to receive the sanction of the Senate. If the Senator from Virginia who is in charge of the bill urges that it be done, I do not imagine that my protest in this particular is going to have sufficient influence to prevent its being done. Therefore I appeal simply to him to omit from his proposition tugs or other craft used for towing purposes, and let us see just exactly what would be the result if vessels of that kind were taken from commercial purposes for which they are now being used.

Mr. MARTIN. I wish I could see my way clear to accede to the suggestion of the Senator from Massachusetts, but I feel that the country is in a great crisis. We are confronted with the most momentous war that the world has ever seen, and surely for the preservation of our Army, the protection of our soldiers who may be on the line of battle in France, when the President of the United States thinks it is necessary to commandeer ships in order to take care of them Congress ought to give him that power. He asks for it, he thinks he needs it, and I am unwilling, so far as I am concerned, to withhold power that is absolutely essential, in my judgment, for the prosecution of the war.

I think we may rely on the President not using this power in any way that will injure unnecessarily the business of the country or any private interest, but surely there ought to be power somewhere to take vessels when the preservation of our Army requires the use of the vessels. That is all that this amendment does. It gives the President of the United States the power to take any vessel that he considers absolutely necessary for the preservation of the interests of this country.

Mr. WEEKS. If the Senator will be willing to omit "including tugs" until we have some troops on the battle line in France, and then if it is decided that it is necessary to take such craft, I will gladly vote for it.

Mr. MARTIN. It may be necessary before the fleet gets to the battle line. The President is not going to use this power wantonly or recklessly or injuriously to the business of the country. We must trust somebody in this great emergency, and surely we can trust the President of the United States not to ruthlessly invade private interests and take ships or tugs of any kind that he does not need.

Mr. WEEKS. What the Navy Department is going to do with these tugs is to take them to Europe and use them for mine sweepers. They are going to be taken when their commercial uses here are of the greatest importance.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, the Senator from Virginia says that we must trust the President; that he will do nothing to injure or disturb private business. Now, we know—those of us who come from New England—if a single tug is taken it will injure business and put our people in a position where they may possibly suffer absolute want because of the fact that they will not be able to get coal. It does seem to me that the Senator from Virginia ought to be willing to exempt tugs or other craft used for towing purposes, as the Senator from Massachusetts suggested.

I called attention to this matter in the first place because it seemed to me that this was a dangerous power to place in the hands of the President. I had in mind the very argument the Senator from Massachusetts has made, because I know how dependent we are—a dependence that is extreme—upon getting our coal through the use of tugs, and we can not get it in any other way.

Mr. WEEKS. Very many of the supplies that are being manufactured for the Government might be directly affected by the impossibility of getting sufficient coal to keep the factories in operation. It is of vital importance. I am not arguing along this line because I come from New England. I would do it as readily if it affected as directly any other section of the country; but it is of sufficient importance for the Senator from Virginia to give consideration to it, whatever section is affected.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Does not the Senator recognize, though, that there is no way of determining now as to the necessity, and the time to determine whether it is necessary to do it is to see the situation at that time and ascertain whether it is more important to take this craft for the Army and Navy or to let it stay where it is? There are tugs in other portions of the country that do not haul coal, and, no doubt, the President would commandeer those instead. I do not think there will be any hard rule that will be imposed by the President upon any of the States of New England or any other section of the country.

Mr. GALLINGER. If that argument is sound, we may as well abdicate and turn everything over to the President of the United States.

Mr. SHAFROTH. No.

Mr. GALLINGER. I am not willing to do that as a Member of this body.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I do not think so; but there is no question that in time of war we have got to give extraordinary powers to the Chief Executive.

Mr. GALLINGER. Certainly; we have done that already.

Mr. SHAFROTH. We are doing that to a certain extent, but I do not believe when we give a right to commandeer large ships we should say the President shall not have the right to take small ships, which it seems to me may be of as much importance as the others.

Mr. GALLINGER. I am unwilling to have the manufacturing interests of my section of the country destroyed or my people frozen to death because the President can commandeer vessels that are absolutely needed in business operations.

Mr. SHAFROTH. They will not be taken unless the emergency is greater than the necessity in private business.

Mr. GALLINGER. It could not be any greater. I should prefer that our people should not freeze to death even though some harm should come to the people of Europe.

Mr. SHAFROTH. There is no danger of freezing to death when the railroads are running right through from the coal fields.

Mr. GALLINGER. Everybody knows about it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts has the floor.

Mr. WEEKS. The Senator from Colorado must know that the railroads running into New England are not sufficient by something like two-fifths of the total requirements to supply the coal. I do not think there is any force in the argument that we should wait for information. I know what the information is. I know what the requirements are in New England, and I know what is going to be done with these tugs. They are going to be taken out of our service and sent to Europe, and I do not believe it is necessary to do it at this time.

Mr. MARTIN. The Senator asked me if tugs were included. I said they were, because they are, in general language; but no reference in any communication I have received has been made to tugs. Besides the language of the amendment itself I find the letter from the Secretary of the Navy alludes to fuel ships and tankers. They are the only things, substantially, referred to in the communication handed to me.

I am sure the Senator is unduly alarmed as to a rigid execution of this power. There ought to be some vessels if the emergency arises and it becomes necessary for the protection of the Army of the country and the people of the country. We are commandeering the lives and fortunes of our people, and surely we ought to be permitted to commandeer in an emergency a few ships to supply them with munitions and food, if it should become necessary. It may never become necessary to commandeer a single ship. I trust the Senator will not look with such suspicion on the grant of a war power in a great emergency like this as to be unwilling to let the President say when it is absolutely necessary for the protection of the country to commandeer a few ships. That is all the power that is asked.

I wish I could see my way clear to make the exception which the Senator asks, but I do not feel that it is necessary, and I do not feel that I would be justified. If it is done, the Senate must do it. I can not myself vote for it or agree that it shall be done, for I believe it is perfectly harmless and free from any evil consequences, and I think it is necessary for the successful conduct of the war that the power should be granted. I hope the Senator may see his way clear to acquiesce in that view.

Mr. WEEKS. I am very desirous of cooperating with the Senator from Virginia in the purposes of the bill, but I do not think I would be doing my duty if I did not propose an amendment to the amendment which has just been offered. As I remember the language, after the word "thereof" I move to insert the words "except tugs or other vessels used for towing purposes."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The SECRETARY. After the words "now constructed or any part thereof," insert the words "except tugs or other vessels used for towing purposes."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts to the amendment of the Senator from Virginia. [Putting the question.] The noes appear to have it.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] to the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. HUGHES] and vote "nay."

Mr. WOLCOTT (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON] to the Senator from Oregon [Mr. LANE] and vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. HOLLIS. I am paired with the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] for to-day. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS] and vote "nay."

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ROBINSON in the chair). The Chair desires to state that he has a general pair with the Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND]. He transfers that pair to the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] and votes "nay."

Mr. KNOX. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN] and withhold my vote.

Mr. KELLOGG (after having voted in the negative). I have a pair with the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] and therefore withdraw my vote.

Mr. GERRY. I desire to announce that the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN] and the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. VARDAMAN] are detained on official business. The Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN] is paired with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX], and the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. VARDAMAN] is paired with the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BRADY].

So Mr. WEEKS's amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I rise to say that it seems to me this legislation is taking an unusual course. In the bill which is now before us we have an entire chapter relating to an emergency shipping fund. We have a Committee on Commerce in this body which has charge of legislation pertaining to our national shipping. Instead of having such an important matter as this referred to that committee, it was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and there considered in secret session, as I understand. We have no information at all furnished us, and no information has been published, as to the grounds for this legislation.

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. NELSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. MARTIN. I want to say to the Senator that he is entirely mistaken in his statement. The Committee on Appropriations has not considered this matter in secret session. On the contrary, I invited Senators who are not members of the committee to be present and to hear what was going on.

Mr. NELSON. Have the hearings on this matter been printed?

Mr. MARTIN. The hearings were not printed for public use, but a copy of the hearings is at the service of the Senator whenever he wants it. Many copies have been distributed in the Senate Chamber. We thought, however, there were some things which ought not to be published, and we have not made them public; but so far as this amendment is concerned, it has been fully explained. I now send to the desk of the Senator from Minnesota a copy of the hearings.

Mr. NELSON. I thank the Senator. The hearings have not been previously available. This has been considered as a sort of confidential matter.

Mr. President, this bill contains some very unusual and far-reaching provisions. As I am obliged to leave the Chamber to attend a meeting of a committee of conference, I can only at this moment refer to one or two of the provisions of the bill. It authorizes the President—which, of course, in this case means the Shipping Board—

> (b) Within the limits of the amounts hereby authorized, to modify, cancel, or requisition any existing contract for the building, production, or purchase of ships or material; and if any contractor shall refuse or fail to comply with the contract as so modified or requisitioned, the President may take immediate possession of any factory of such contractor or any part thereof without taking possession of the entire factory, and may use the same for such times and in such manner as he may consider necessary or expedient.

It not only authorizes the Shipping Board to take possession of the ships which have been partially completed, to commandeer them, but it authorizes the board to change and modify contracts which have been made between the shipbuilder and the man who has a ship in process of construction. Then what is the remedy provided? That the President shall fix the compensation, and if the owners are not satisfied with the compensation the President fixes they are to receive 50 per cent of what he allows them, whatever that may be, and for the balance they are to go into court.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I desire to suggest to the Senator from Minnesota that that has been changed to 75 per cent by an amendment which was offered on the floor a few moments ago.

Mr. NELSON. It strikes me that legislation such as this ought to have been considered by the Committee on Commerce, to whom it properly appertains. Hearings should have been had upon it, and there should have been careful consideration given it. Instead of that, it is to be rushed through on an appropriation bill, without any hearing or consideration by the committee to which such legislation appertains.

Mr. President, all I can say is that I utterly protest against such legislation and such legislative methods. I am willing to go as far as any reasonable man in sustaining and supporting the Government in this emergency, and I think my action and votes in this body indicate that, but such methods as those which have been pursued in reference to this part of the bill are utterly repulsive to me. I trust they will not be brought to a successful issue to the extent which is sought in this bill. I am surprised that such a matter should be brought before the Appropriations Committee before being considered by the Committee on Commerce. I am also surprised that such an important matter should not have been more carefully considered even by the Committee on Appropriations and the people interested allowed an opportunity to be heard upon it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MARTIN. The proposition to change 50 per cent to 75 per cent, on page 6, line 11, was suggested by the Senator from Washington.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator from Washington expected the chairman of the committee to offer the amendment. It is only necessary to change the percentage in two places in the bill.

Mr. MARTIN. I move, on page 6, line 11, before the words "per cent." to strike out "50" and to insert "75."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Virginia will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 6, line 11, before the words "per cent," it is proposed to strike out "50" and to insert "75," so that it will read:

Such person shall be paid 75 per cent of the amount so determined by the President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to. The Chair hears none.

Mr. MARTIN. On page 6, line 14, the same change should be made.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Virginia will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 6, line 14, before the words "per cent," it is proposed to strike out "50" and to insert "75," so as to read:

And shall be entitled to sue the United States to recover such further sum as, added to said 75 per cent, will make up such amount as will be just compensation therefor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to. The Chair hears none.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I was obliged to leave the Chamber while the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] was speaking. I confess that I am a little surprised to find this section here in this bill. The Shipping Board came before the Committee on Commerce at the last session and had hearings lasting over some days. The Commerce Committee reported the bill. An attempt was made to pass it, but it was crowded out by other business during the latter part of the session.

I inquired from the chairman of the committee, the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER], what was doing in reference to that legislation, which we had been told was highly important, and he stated to me that the Shipping Board wanted to submit a different plan That plan ordinarily ought to have been brought in here as a bill; it should have been referred to the Committee on Commerce, examined by that committee, and reported back, and if accepted the amount of the appropriation ought to have been submitted to the Appropriations Committee.

I have not had an opportunity to read the statements that have been made by the Shipping Board since the board has changed its plan of action. There was a limited number of copies of the hearings printed for confidential use, but I have not been so fortunate as to get one of them. I should like this part of the bill to be passed over without any action that would prevent full action in the Committee of the Whole, so that we may have an opportunity to examine it.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. REED. Yes.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, speaking for the committee, I want the RECORD to show our attitude in reference to this bill. As a member of the subcommittee I helped prepare it.

An unusual thing has happened, so far as Congress is concerned, in the drafting of this bill. The bill is unusual from beginning to end. Most of the appropriations which are in the bill, if not all of them, are not within the jurisdiction of the general Appropriations Committee of the Senate. They are Army and Navy matters that, under ordinary procedure, would go either to the Committee on Military Affairs of the Senate or to the Naval Committee of the Senate. The situation was such, however, that when the general Army bill came up in the House of Representatives a blanket appropriation carrying something like $3,000,000,000 was included in the bill. The House was unwilling to pass the bill in that shape, I understand, and struck the appropriation out; and the estimates for these $3,000,000,000 for the increase of the Army and the Navy were referred by the Speaker of the House to the Appropriations Committee of the House as a deficiency, and that committee prepared this bill as a deficiency bill.

All deficiencies go to the general Appropriations Committee of the Senate, whether they are for the Army, for the Navy, or for the civil government. This bill, having come over here as a deficiency from the general Appropriations Committee of the House, was referred to the general Appropriations Committee of the Senate, and the subcommittee on deficiencies took it up for consideration at the hearings.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I should like to finish my statement, but if the Senator only desires to ask a question I will yield, and then I will resume.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Just a word; not a question but a suggestion. I wish to say that these appropriations, or at least those for military purposes, are not deficiency appropriations in any sense of the word.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The Senator from Washington is absolutely right about that.

Mr. POINDEXTER. They may be construed as emergency appropriations, but they have nothing whatever to do with any deficiency arising out of appropriations which have been heretofore made.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The Senator is absolutely correct in his statement; and I am merely trying to put in the RECORD the attitude of the committee that has this bill in charge. There may be a few of these items that are real deficiencies; but the bulk of them are general appropriations for the Army and the Navy. But the Senate did not fix the status of this bill; it was fixed in the other House by being referred to the general Appropriations Committee and handled as a deficiency bill. It came to your committee in that attitude. We have not sought it; we have not asked for it; we have merely gone along and handled the items as they came. I presume, after it was referred to the committee, so far as these items are concerned, we obtained legitimate jurisdiction over it, and had a right to bring it in, so long as no Senator rose in his seat and moved a rereference to other committees, which any Senator had a right to do, and had an opportunity for at least two weeks to do, if he desired so to do. So, I think there can be no reflection on the general Appropriations Committee that we have gone ahead with this work.

Now, as to the item to which the Senator from Missouri refers——

Mr. REED. I hope the Senator does not understand me to have reflected in any way upon the committee.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. No; I realize that the Senator's remarks were pertinent and perfectly correct, and that no reflection upon the committee was intended; but I think it is well for the future that a statement as to the attitude of the Appropriations Committee should go into the RECORD.

When the suggestion for a greater merchant marine came here there was no desire whatever on the part of the general Appropriations Committee to handle the subject. The President of the United States suggested that it be put on this bill as a matter of expedition. When the chairman of the Shipping Board laid his proposal before the general Appropriations Committee, or its subcommittee, he had a general plan of legislation, including this appropriation, relating to the affairs of the Shipping Board and to a readjustment of the entire situation. The Subcommittee on Deficiencies, whose action was subsequently approved by the members of the whole committee, refused to consider that bill. We said that that was legislation within the jurisdiction of the Commerce Committee, and that, no matter how urgent it was, the Shipping Board must go beforce the Commerce Committee and present its case and have a bill reported. Of course, so far as the appropriation is concerned, that was a legitimate matter for the consideration of the general Appropriations Committee, because all appropriations that are made for the Shipping Board or the building up of the merchant marine are within the jurisdiction of the Appropriations Committee. We rejected the general legislation which we were asked to consider, but incorporated in the bill appropriations that are really within our jurisdiction. Probably the only portion of this bill that was originally within our jurisdiction was the appropriation for the merchant marine or the carrying on the work of the Shipping Board.

Instead of adopting the program that was proposed by the Shipping Board, we have rewritten a paragraph in the naval bill, which authorized the President, acting for the Navy, to commandeer ships and shipyards. That is the only legislation we have put in this bill. That provision was passed by the Senate almost unanimously, if not unanimously, within the last two months. Of course, if we merely made an appropriation of $750,000,000 to build ships and authorized the general manager of the shipping corporation to go out and build them, he would not get very far in spending the $750,000,000 if he did not have some power behind him to clear the shipyards, to clear the ways, and if he were not given a free hand to make contracts and spend the money.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, I should like to suggest to the Senator, too, that in times of war and for the purposes of war it is just as necessary to have a merchant marine for war purposes as it is to have a Navy, and that is the only thing we undertook to do.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Absolutely; as much so and more so.

I do not want to take up the time of the Senate in discussing this matter, but before I sit down in a few words I want to call the attention of the Senate to the importance of this appropriation. I have it directly from the very best authority that if we land an army in France all that the French and English Governments can do to sustain that army and put it on the battlefield is to furnish us a port at which to land the men and the rails behind the line to the battle field and to the trenches.

Mr. MARTIN. I do not think rails were included.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. It may be limited only to the port. At any rate, we will have to furnish all the cars, locomotives, and equipment we can for operating trains, and we will have to furnish for our forces the supplies, the clothing, the guns, the shells, and even down to the fuel. I am informed by an authority which there is no possibility of contradicting that the strain of supplying the armies now in Europe is such that they can not stand any additional strain in connection with any considerable number of American soldiers on that field, so we have got to supply them.

We have 2,000,000 tons of ships of our own and about 600,000 tons which we have taken from the Germans and bought from the Austrians. In the last month the German submarines sank in the neighborhood of 1,000,000 tons of shipping on the Atlantic. If we pass this bill, it is going to be six months before we can get a single ship built. The question is whether the Senate wants expedition, and I do not think it is fair to criticize the committee for determining to bring about expedition by the passage of an appropriation of which it has jurisdiction. It did not have jurisdiction of the subsequent legislation proposed, but we can not build these ships to-day with our shipyards filled with ships and operating on an eight-hour basis with one shift. We have to get the ships now building off the ways and operate the shipyards with three shifts in order to expedite the construction.

If we want to accomplish anything for our allies, we have got to send them supplies, and we have got to get the ships to carry them. If we want to maintain an army on the battle field of France, we must have ships to carry them there and ships to carry their supplies. If we want to maintain navies on the seas, we must have fuel ships and supply ships. I want to say to Senators that, if this war is to be a success, the first question and the last question to be considered is ships, ships, and more ships. We can not start the war without ships, and we can not successfully conclude it without ships.

Mr. KIRBY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do.

Mr. KIRBY. I should like to know whether it is the purpose of the Government to build the wooden ships we have heard so much talk about, and operate them itself, and whether it proposes to carry supplies at Government expense and for what purpose—for general trade or solely to carry our own troops, our own munitions, and our own supplies? What is expected to be done with these ships when the war is over? If wooden ships are to be constructed, in my opinion they will be 40 or 50 years out of date when they are contracted for, and they will be absolutely nothing more than junk when the war is over. I should like to know something about that. I do not know, and I have heard nothing about these features of the matter at all.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will say to the Senator that I can not speak by the card or with authority. The control of these ships under the law to-day is vested in the United States Shipping Board and the President, and it is not affected by this bill at all. The terms of this provision relate to construction, not to subsequent control. This provision looks to the construction of ships and the acquiring of ships, either by purchase or construction, but does not provide for operation. There is no question about operation involved here.

Outside of that, to answer the Senator's question as fully as I may——

Mr. KIRBY. Here is what I mean: I do not understand the Senator's statement in connection with this provision of the bill:

> All ships constructed, purchased, or requisitioned under authority herein, or heretofore or hereafter acquired by the United States, shall be managed, operated, and disposed of as the President may direct.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Well, that means through the Shipping Board. The President directs the Shipping Board how, and that is the authority they have. They operate under him now, and they will operate under him after this bill is passed.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. GALLINGER. Recurring to the interrogatory of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. KIRBY] as to wooden ships, I think it is an historical fact that the Shipping Board—a board in which some of us have not the utmost confidence—recommended that a thousand wooden ships should be built. That was one of their first recommendations, as I understand it. Gen. Goethals, we are informed, has vetoed that; and while they will build some wooden ships, Gen. Goethals insists that the ships shall, as a rule, be of 3,500 tons, and built of steel. I think that a very wise conclusion, and it is fortunate for the country that Gen. Goethals is in a position where he can dictate that matter.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I yield.

Mr. THOMAS. The statement of the Senator from New Hampshire is extremely interesting. I venture to inquire when Gen. Goethals came to that conclusion?

Mr. GALLINGER. We had the statement made to us that he had come to that conclusion. While he admitted that he could not entirely stop the construction of wooden ships, yet he was in favor of building steel ships of 3,500 tons.

Mr. THOMAS. I understood that Gen. Goethals was in favor of building ships as rapidly as possible so as to meet the exigency. What he wanted, as stated by the Senator from Alabama, was ships, and he wanted them as soon as he could get them, whether wooden or steel, or both.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Well, I will say to the Senator that, so far as I understand the proposition, $50,000,000 was appropriated some time ago to build ships, and Gen. Goethals, as manager of the United States Shipping Board, has contracted up to the full extent of that $50,000,000. Among the ships he has thus contracted for are a number of wooden ships. He said that there was a limitation on the contracts for wooden ships, because of the ways being occupied, for one thing, but primarily because the timber was still in the trees, in the forests, and had to be cut down, and the work could not be expedited as rapidly as if the ships were built of steel.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me further, when we formerly built wooden ships we used timber that was not cut down and made into a ship the next day; we had timber that had been kiln-dried for years in many instances. It is incredible that any sane board is going to argue that they can go into the forests of any part of this country and cut down timber and build ships of it this year. It is unthinkable that that should be done.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I want to say to the Senator——

Mr. THOMAS. May I say a word?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Very well.

Mr. THOMAS. I heard Gen. Goethals say about 10 days ago that the difficulty was to find the shipyards and men for construction. He was prepared to furnish the required material of the proper sort, which, of course, includes seasoned timber.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I want to say to the Senator that I do not think there is a Senator on this floor who will set himself up as a ship expert and say that he can build the required ships. Your committee has in no way attempted to tie the hands of the Government in their discretion as to how it shall use this money. What we want is expedition, and this bill places the control and the judgment as to how the ships are to be built in the hands of Gen. Goethals, who, as the whole country knows, has been successful in the field of endeavor in which he has engaged for the Government, and, to his credit, I want to say that he gave up a contract that would have paid him a large sum of money in New York to take this place, and that the Shipping Board offered him, in addition to his retired salary, $15,000 a year, but he declined to take anything from the Government except his officer's salary to serve the Government in this respect.

Mr. KIRBY. Mr. President, I do not question that Gen. Goethals is both able and disinterested. What I want to know is what kind of ships you are going to build and what you are going to do with them?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The Senator has asked me a question that I can not answer further than I have, because the discretion is left to Gen. Goethals to build the best ships that he can build in the shortest time.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, may I say to the Senator that my information—which is more or less authentic, I think, because I have been in conference both with the Shipping Board and with Gen. Goethals on this matter of ships, and with a great many people interested in the subject from all over the country—that at first, as the Senator from New Hampshire signified, the board had the idea of building wooden ships. That was based very largely upon the belief at that time that it was impossible to get steel; and the board realized the importance and the absolute necessity of having ships, and there were not ships for sale anywhere. They had to build them, and the idea was to build them as quickly as possible, even without building them as large as they might have wished otherwise, so as to be of immediate use and benefit. Later on they found that they could get steel that would be suitable and at prices much better than they had supposed, and then the plan was evolved of the fabricated ship, so that the mills manufacturing steel can make this material which can be used for ships, which can be used in bridges, which can be used in buildings, and can be used for various purposes. There will not be any stoppage of the industries by reason of their devoting their plants to the building of such material as can be used in ships.

In other words, the plan now is, as I understand—and I think that is agreed on by Gen. Goethals and by the Shipping Board and all working in perfect harmony—to build both kinds of ships; to build the wooden ships where they can be built to advantage and serve the purpose of the need, and to build the steel ships likewise, and to make contracts so that the work can proceed as rapidly as possible and as advantageously as possible.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. That is my understanding.

Mr. KIRBY. Mr. President, if either one of the Senators will answer a little bit further, we established an insurance bureau down here in the Treasury Department to insure our foreign commerce during the war, and the Government paid for it and charged rates, as I understood.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes.

Mr. KIRBY. Now, we are to establish a line of carriers, as I understand, to carry the commerce of the Nation. Do we charge anybody for it? And what becomes of the money that we get for it?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I shall be glad to answer that question.

Mr. KIRBY. I am trying to find out what is the purpose of building these ships, and what they are going to be used for when they are built.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I shall be glad to answer the Senator's question: In the first place, I want to call his attention to the fact that this legislation does not affect that question either way; but, as a secondary proposition, I want to say to the Senator——

Mr. GERRY. Mr. President, with the Senator's permission, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield for that purpose?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I yield.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Rhode Island suggests the absence of a quorum. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Gore	McLean	Sherman
Bankhead	Gronna	Martin	Smith, Mich.
Beckham	Harding	Myers	Smoot
Borah	Hardwick	New	Sterling
Brandegee	Husting	Newlands	Stone
Broussard	James	Norris	Sutherland
Culberson	Kellogg	Pittman	Trammell
Curtis	Kendrick	Poindexter	Underwood
Dillingham	Kenyon	Ransdell	Wadsworth
Fall	King	Reed	Weeks
Fletcher	Kirby	Robinson	Williams
France	Knox	Saulsbury	Wolcott
Gallinger	McCumber	Shafroth
Gerry	McKellar	Sheppard

Mr. GERRY. I have been requested to announce that the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN] and the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. VARDAMAN] are detained from the Senate on official business.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. My colleague [Mr. TOWNSEND] is temporarily absent from the Chamber.

Mr. BECKHAM. I desire to announce that the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS] is absent on official business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-eight Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, while the roll was being called I found in the hearings a statement by Gen. Goethals that throws some light on the question that was being asked by the Senator. I read from page 125:

> In the shipping program I have lined up the idea to get as many wooden ships as we can have promised and completed, say within a year or a year and a half; and to go to the small ships, fabricated ships of 5,000 tons, to the extent of as many as we can fabricate.

In other words, from that statement I judge that he is going to take the wooden ships where they are available, and that he is going to fabricate as many 5,000-ton steel ships as it is possible to have, and as rapidly as he can do it.

I did not intend to detain the Senate at any length by this speech, but I want to say this in fairness to the committee of which I am a member: We had no desire to take jurisdiction of this matter. We concede that all of the provisions of this bill relating to the building of these ships, from the paragraphs containing the appropriations on down—that is, from line 13, on page 3, down to the bottom of this shipping paragraph—are subject to a point of order. It is new legislation; it is on a general appropriation bill; and if any Senator thinks we have invaded the jurisdiction of another committee, and is willing to take the responsibility at this time, he can make the point of order and save delay, and let us get along with the balance of the bill. I do not think it would be advisable to do so. We do not want the jurisdiction; we did not want it; but we worked out a bill that is acceptable to the Government authorities, and I think the expedition of this construction is the most important thing that we have in the war to-day.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, while I do not imagine that any Senator would make a point of order against any provision of this bill, yet is the Senator sure that a point of order would lie, if it were made, on a deficiency bill?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I take it that this is a general appropriation bill——

Mr. GALLINGER. I take a different view.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. And that any new legislation on a general appropriation bill is subject to a point of order in the Senate. I do not think there can be any doubt about that, and I believe that the best way to do is always to go right to the point. Instead of criticizing the committee for bringing in this important legislation, if a Senator thinks it ought not to be here, then he ought to put it out. But I hope that it will not be done, because I think there is nothing in any of the bills that are before the Senate to-day, or that have been before it since we passed the resolution declaring war against Germany, that is of more vital interest to the life and the safety and the independence of this Nation than to build at once sufficient ships to handle our over-seas trade, take care of our armies and navies, and supply our allies with food and munitions of war.

That is all I wish to say on the subject.

Mr. KIRBY. Mr. President, I offer an amendment to the amendment, which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Arkansas offers an amendment to the amendment, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out the periods occurring at the ends of lines 6 and 12 on page 3 and to insert at the end of each of the paragraphs the following words:

> To be expended out of the fund raised by the issue of bonds and certificates of indebtedness authorized by act approved April 24, 1917, entitled "An act to authorize an issue of bonds to meet expenditures for the national security and defense, and for the purpose of assisting in the prosecution of the war, to extend credit to foreign governments, and for other purposes."

The foregoing words are to be inserted in the first instance after the numerals "$150,000,000" and in the second after the numerals "$250,000,000."

Mr. KIRBY. Mr. President, I do not know much about this shipping legislation. The committee has seemed to think that the Senate would be as well advised as the committee is. I have seen none of the hearings, and I have heard very little explanation made of the legislation here. I may not be in favor of it, because I do not know anything about it; but it seems to me that we ought to have had a little more explanation of this matter before we are asked to expend $400,000,000 in the promotion of it. I shall not oppose it, however, because it may be necessary.

I judge from what the spokesman for the committee has said that about all our allies are going to do for us in France is to give us a place upon which to fight. He says they will allow our ships to land, but that we must carry our own railroad and other equipment to get our troops to the front, and take care of them after we have gotten them there. It seems that that is about all there is left for us to do. Just a place to fight is what we are offered freely by our allies, with whom we are cooperating in a very substantial and businesslike way.

I should like to have this amendment adopted at this particular place to the amendment, unless there is some special objection. This money has been raised for a war emergency. This is an emergency, as I understand, and I believe the money ought to be expended out of that fund and not in addition to it.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, I do not see any real objection to the Senator's amendment, nor do I see anything to be accomplished by it. This money, if the bill passes, will come out of the Treasury. It is appropriated out of the Treasury. If these seven billions of bonds are sold, the proceeds go into the Treasury. I have no doubt that most of this money will come out of the seven billions of bonds. It has to come out of it; but if it happened to come out of the taxes, then what you ordinarily pay for out of the taxes would come out of the seven billions of bonds. It is merely a question of bookkeeping, and it may put the Treasury Department to some little inconvenience in bookkeeping; but otherwise than that, it can not affect the question one way or the other.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, can the Senator from Alabama tell us how many ships are under construction in this country for foreign countries?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I can not say for foreign countries, but the hearings disclose the fact that there is 1,600,000 tons under construction in all. Of course, however, part of that is for American shipping; but I should estimate that the larger portion of it is for foreign countries or foreign corporations.

Mr. CALDER. Can the Senator tell me what is to be the policy of our Government toward these ships that are under construction?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. In regard to taking these ships?

Mr. CALDER. Yes.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I can not speak by the card on that. I shall be glad to give the Senator such information as I have. I know that our Government wants to clear the ways of the ships that are on them—that is the most important question—so that they can be used. Most of these contracts have been made on an eight-hour basis, with one shift a day. Our Government wants to put the work on a two or three shift basis, so that we will expedite the building of the ships and make as great a use of the ways as possible. This bill provides for expediting the building of these ships. My information is, although I do not speak with any authority, that those ships that are nearing completion will be allowed to be completed in their usual course and go to the corporations or men or countries that have already contracted for them; but ships that are just beginning, and may occupy the ways for a considerable time, will probably be commandeered under this bill, in order that the Government may handle those ships, expedite them as rapidly as possible, and clear the ways to put their shipping in. That is the information I have.

Mr. CALDER. Can the Senator tell me whether there is any information in the hearings that would tend to show how long it takes to construct a steel ship of seven or eight thousand tons?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will state that in the hearings the statement is made by Gen. Goethals that this Government can make a contract with one of the great bridge-building companies of the country to build ships for us, that they will agree to deliver the first ship at the end of six months, and from that time on they will deliver us one ship a day as long as we want them, and those ships will be of about 5,000 tons a piece. Now, we will not get a ship for six months; but at the end of six months, under that contract, we can get one 5,000-ton ship a day as long as we want to continue the contract.

Mr. CALDER. I will say to the Senator that if an arrangement of that kind can be made, it is a very excellent one. I have talked to a number of very reputable shipbuilders in Washington, and they have rather expressed the opinion that it would take eight months to turn out the first ship; but they also strongly advised an arrangement with these great bridge-building concerns, contending that if they were given 50 or 100 ships to build they could fabricate them at their mills, and, to my astonishment, they said that it could be done easily, and then bring them to tidewater and put them together and put them in the water.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I understand that that is contemplated. I will say to the Senator, moreover, that from the information the committee has received I do not think it is at all probable that the power of commandeering ships, or yards either, will have to be resorted to, or will be resorted to. But we are at war, and we have got to have ships, and Congress will adjourn, and we have got to give the authorities the power to produce the results, though I doubt very much whether the power will ever be used.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, there is a proviso on page 6 of the bill, at the bottom of the page, giving the President the right to authorize the construction of ships in the most expeditious way upon the basis of actual cost plus a reasonable profit. I would not vote to strike that proviso from the bill; but I make the statement for the RECORD, with a knowledge of the business conditions in some of the manufacturing plants of the country, that ordinarily that is a very dangerous provision.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator that that provision is not put in the bill with the expectation of its being used, but to give that latitude if it is necessary to use it.

Mr. CALDER. Some of the shipbuilders I have talked to tell me that the effect of that will be to disorganize many of the yards, because it is difficult for them to conduct Government business upon this basis and conduct private business under different conditions. It tends to add to the cost of construction, and very materially affects what we may have to pay for the ships.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. From the evidence before the committee I do not think that power will be used. From the evidence that came before the committee I think it is clear that Gen. Goethals intended to build these ships by way of contract with the usual method, but he wants the power to accomplish the results if he can not do it the other way.

Mr. CALDER. I will say to the Senator that I would not take it from him. At the same time it is an exceedingly dangerous thing, because I am fearful that those things are going to add to the cost to the Government of doing business in nearly every phase of governmental activity.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I yield to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Would it divert the Senator to explain to us at this time, if he knows what is going on, the extent to which, under the direction of this Advisory Board, contracts are now being let for a large amount of work at cost plus 10 per cent, without any limitation at all as to the total cost?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I am not advised about that, because the man who testified before the committee was Gen. Goethals, who testified in regard to shipping; and the Advisory Council has nothing to do with that.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. No; but I thought possibly the Senator might have made some investigation with reference to this practice of letting contracts at cost plus 10 per cent, as it is going on elsewhere, and whether the result is not that the prices will be far in excess of anything that has normally been considered reasonable?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will say to the Senator that no evidence in reference to that matter came before our committee at all.

Mr. WEEKS and Mr. SMOOT addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield, and to whom?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I yield to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. WEEKS. I want to suggest to the Senator from Georgia that I propose to introduce an amendment to the part of this paragraph where the question of fixing the price is referred to, fixing it at cost plus 8 per cent. Eight per cent is the point where the excess profits tax commences in our general legislation; and it seems to me that in fixing the price, whether it is referred to as reasonable or in some other terms, we may well say "a price equal to cost plus 8 per cent."

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will say to the Senator that I thought he wanted to ask me a question. I yield the floor. I was through.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, I want to make a few comments on this matter.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Alabama a question before he sits down.

Mr. WEEKS. I yield to the Senator from Minnesota for the purpose of asking the Senator from Alabama a question.

Mr. KELLOGG. I was so far away that I could not hear the statement of the Senator from Alabama. Did I understand him to say that the ship contracts entered into with foreign owners that are nearly completed will not be interfered with?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. They will not be interfered with if they are nearing completion. I will say to the Senator that my understanding is, from the testimony given before the committee, that most of these ships that are on the ways belonging to foreign nations are really for the Government of Great Britain, although the contract is not made in the name of the Cunard Co. There may be some few ships of foreign nations. If they are nearing completion, my understanding is that it is not the purpose of this Government to interfere with the contracts; but if they are not, and we have got to get the yards for the purpose of expediting matters, the contract will probably be taken over.

Mr. KELLOGG. I had understood that before the Commerce Committee it appeared last winter that a large number of ships were under construction for Norwegian owners or the Government of Norway.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. There may be some, but the information we have is that the larger portion of them are for the British Government, through some of its corporations.

Mr. WEEKS. I am still yielding to the Senator from Minnesota to ask a question of the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. KELLOGG. Am I limited to one question? I am not through.

Mr. WEEKS. No; I wish the Senator to complete his questions.

Mr. KELLOGG. Have those contracts been completed?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. You mean with the Norwegian Government?

Mr. KELLOGG. Yes.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I am not informed about that.

Mr. WEEKS. If I may have the attention of the Senator from Alabama, I do not wish to ask a question, but I am going in a general way to propound some inquiries which I would like to have the Senator from Alabama hear, while I am discussing the question. I do not want to impose on him and I am not going to take much time.

Mr. President, I would not make a point of order against this proposition, as it was suggested might be done by the Senator from Alabama, because, in the first place, I think it is necessary and desirable in some form that this legislation should be adopted. In the second place, I am very glad that the Committee on Appropriations took the matter up, because the legislation is in better form than I anticipated it might be, basing my opinion on expressions which I have seen in the press.

One of the great difficulties in legislation giving unrestricted power like this is the effect that it is going to have on the country in matters like those relating to the sale of the liberty bonds. Everybody knows that the sale of the liberty bonds has been a great failure. There is no denying that statement. I am not going to discuss the question now, but it is very largely because of the manner in which it has been undertaken. However, it is a failure because the people are uncertain. They do not know when their business is going to be affected or how directly or indirectly it is going to be affected. Business is in a wavering condition. When we give these unrestricted, unlimited powers to the Government we are simply adding to that condition of mind which puts the business man in a position where he says to himself, "I think I will go slowly, because I do not know how much I am going to be affected by all this unusual legislation which is being adopted." This is certainly unusual legislation. The Senate deliberated for days and almost months over a shipping bill which finally, against the judgment of many of us, provided for an expenditure of $50,000,000 for building ships. That $50,000,000, however, was restricted in all kinds of ways connected with the operation and all other matters relating to ships. I admit that conditions are quite different to-day.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question? The Senator is a member of the Naval Committee?

Mr. WEEKS. I am sorry I am not, but I recall the legislation to which I think the Senator refers.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I think the Senator supported legislation on the naval bill that is in form almost identical with the legislation that the committee suggests here.

Mr. WEEKS. I did, and I am very glad I supported it. I am going to support this legislation, but I do not want to have it go any further than is necessary.

The Senator has just stated that these ships which are being constructed for the Cunard Co., for example, are really for the Government of Great Britain. It is immaterial to us, in my judgment, whether you call it the Cunard Co. or the Government of Great Britain, and it is immaterial to us whether we commandeer those ships or whether we allow them to be completed and turned over to the real purchasers. It is immaterial except in this respect: Why should we invest our money in ships that are being constructed for our allies, that quite likely are going to be put in exactly the same service we would put them in? If we are going to be extremely selfish, why should we invest our money in ships that are going into a service beneficial to us and our allies and where they may be lost—some of them are quite likely to be lost—when somebody else is going to complete the ships and put them into that same service?

I do not contend, Mr. President, that we are selfish enough to say that we would refrain from doing it because of the loss of money, but what we want are ships in a certain definite service, and I do not see that it makes any difference to us whether those ships are provided by our allies or by ourselves. As these ships are being built for our allies, why should we invest our money in those particular ships? Why should we not do something else with it that will be equally beneficial to the general cause?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. If the Senator will allow me to answer his questions——

Mr. WEEKS. I shall be very glad to have the Senator answer.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I think a number of the members of the committee had grave doubt about the very question the Senator is now raising. When the bill was first under consideration it was stated before the committee by Mr. Denman, chairman of the Shipping Board, that except in the case of those ships the Government itself is using where it carries its own insurance, of course, a number of these ships are going to be let out on contracts to individuals, many of them just to go across the sea and come back again to carry their supplies. Where they are lost they are insured by the Government, but the Government charges it to the freight and the freight is compelled to pay the cost of the ship. The statement was made before our committee, and I think it is borne out, that as far as our Government ship insurance is concerned we have not lost any money; we are making money out of it; because the statement was made before the committee that there is not a war insurance risk company in the world that is not to-day making a profit, because they magnify the risk in making the rates. Therefore we would not lose the ships.

But I will say to the Senator, if that was all there was involved in the question I would be disposed to agree with the position he has taken in the matter and let the English Government take its own ships and run them and let them stay on the ways until they are finished; let the British Government have its own ships and we take ours. But in the final conclusion of the situation Gen. Goethals said to us that it was of the utmost importance to carry out this project that he should have the power to take over these English contracts, if he wanted to do it, to expedite this work. We do not compel him to do it.

Mr. WEEKS. Let me ask the Senator if all the shipyards in the United States are not now working at full capacity.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Our information is that they are not; that they are working at full capacity on a single shift, an eight hours a day shift; but what our Government wants to do is to make them work on two or three shifts a day.

Mr. WEEKS. Is the Senator sure they are only working on one shift?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do not say all of them are; but I am sure Gen. Goethals said before the committee, and so did Mr. Denman, that the greater portion of them are working on a single shift.

Mr. WEEKS. If that is true, and if this shipping is offering to builders on terms which would be extremely profitable, if the shipbuilders could get the employees, why have they not been working more than one shift?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I could answer the Senator's question, but it might involve a statement in reference to contracts with some of our allies, made before this war came on. I think it is inadvisable to answer on the floor of the Senate, but I will be glad in a few minutes to go to the Senator and tell him.

Mr. WEEKS. What I am leading up to is to limit this intended operation in every possible direction. I am going to vote for it, but I want to modify it as much as possible, so that we will not use any more of our money than is necessary and so that we will not, to any greater extent than is necessary, impair the confidence of the business of the country.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I am in accord with that view; but when the man in whose hands we are going to put this business of the Government, a man we know has accomplished great things on the Panama Canal, a man in whose ability we all have the utmost confidence, comes before your committee and says that it is of the utmost importance that he should have this power in order to accomplish this result, it seems to me we ought to sustain him.

Mr. WEEKS. I want to say a word about that. I have the utmost confidence in the general manager of the shipbuilding corporation. Certainly no man in our time has accomplished more along the line of his own profession anywhere than he, and yet he never built a ship, and there is not a person connected with the Shipping Board who ever built a ship, either wooden or steel. We are taking the judgment of those gentlemen without, as I understand it, calling before the committee any person who ever has built a ship. They may be right, but I think it is a matter that may be properly questioned as to what our course is going to be in a transaction that is going to involve $750,000,000.

Mr. KNOX. May I ask the Senator a question? Did Goethals ever build a canal before?

Mr. WEEKS. No; but he was an engineer, and he was trained to do that very thing.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. He may not do it. He will call in experts.

Mr. WEEKS. It may be that he will. I am not questioning his ability to do this service satisfactorily, but I am questioning the judgment of providing for an expenditure of $750,000,000 without asking for the testimony of those who really know about matters of this kind. Moreover, let me say that if I am correctly informed, and I believe I am, Gen. Goethals has advised and does advise now against building wooden ships. Gen. Goethals has time and again said within the last two weeks that he would be glad to be detached from the service to which he is detailed and about which he has known nothing and ordered back to the employment about which he does know so much—engineering in the Army.

Mr. CALDER. Will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. WEEKS. I do.

Mr. CALDER. I know of one shipyard in this country that has a contract to build 14 Cunard vessels. It will turn the first one out in about a month from now and an additional ship each succeeding month. There are 14 in construction at this moment.

Mr. WEEKS. For whom?

Mr. CALDER. The Cunard Co.

Mr. SMOOT rose.

Mr. WEEKS. I yield to the Senator from Utah. I am not ready to yield the floor.

Mr. SMOOT. In this connection I desire to call the Senator's attention to the testimony given before the committee, on page 131 of the testimony, while we were discussing the question of taking over the English ships. By the way, I will say to the Senator that I have an amendment which I will offer providing that we can commandeer all the ships in the country with the exception of those that are being built for a foreign country. After taking in the committee the same position that is taken by the Senator to-day, Gen. Goethals made this statement to me:

Gen. GOETHALS. Senator, would you mind our doing this, taking over in the shipyards all shipping not contracted for by England or English firms?

Senator SMOOT. Every pound of it.

Gen. GOETHALS. And authorizing us to expend money to expedite the completion of British ships that are on the ways?

Senator SMOOT. Undoubtedly.

Gen. GOETHALS. All right, then; give me that, and make my appropriation $400,000,000 and my authorization $750,000,000, and let me do that.

The general then suggested that this amendment be adopted beginning on page 7, line 7, which reads:

The President may, in the execution of the powers hereby granted, in lieu of requisitioning ships now under construction in the United States for any citizen of the United States, or for the Government of any nation at war with Germany, or for any citizen of such nation so at war with Germany, expend the funds hereby authorized for such purpose in expediting the construction of such ships, under such arrangements and such agreements for repayment as he may deem wise and proper.

We adopted that, and as soon as the question itself comes up I shall offer the amendment, and I am going to take the time of the Senate to go into a number of contracts that have been made, the amount of shipping that is on the ways now for England, and the amount that is on the ways in the shipyards of the United States for other parties, including Norway. I shall call attention to the program that is mapped out and the cost of it. I believe that the Senate will give their attention to what I have to say and look at this question not only from the advantage to our country and foreign countries, our allies, in the war, but as a business proposition they will agree to the amendment I shall offer. After presenting it, of course I shall have nothing more to say, and will only await the action of the Senate.

Mr. WEEKS. I am very glad the Senator from Utah is going to give us the information about the amount of shipping which is now under construction. I hope he will include the capacity of the shipyards of the United States. If my understanding is correct, the shipyards of the United States, working at their utmost capacity, could not construct over 5,000,000 tons of shipping in a year, and they would have to be cleared and the material ready at the beginning of the year to even do that. Of course, that condition can not be possible, because the shipyards are now constructing very much for our Government, and many of the ships which they are now constructing will be on the ways for a year or two years, especially the battleships. Therefore that is not possible.

I am told that a contract can be made for the construction of the kind of ships to which the Senator from Alabama has referred at the rate of about $150 a ton, which will be more than twice the normal price of that kind of construction. One hundred and fifty dollars a ton for 5,000,000 tons of shipping would be just seven and a half million dollars. So if the materials for building the ships were ready at the shipyards and there was no shipping under construction at this time, we could within the next year possibly spend the $750,000,000 provided in this bill. I think very much more is provided in the bill than can be expended, and that is a matter which I want to bring to the attention of the Committee on Appropriations, because I do not think we ought to appropriate more than is probably necessary for the purposes for which the appropriations are made. I know it will be said it will not be expended if it is not necessary. That is quite true; but then every item of that kind adds to the uncertainty of the situation and involves us in raising additional money, possibly more than we really need, and we are going to need all our facilities if the present conditions are any indication of the temper of the public in raising what money we do need.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I should like to ask the Senator a question for information. The Senator has made a statement concerning the capacity of the shipyards of the United States. It has been stated at 5,000,000 tons. Does that include working one shift, two shifts, or three shifts?

Mr. WEEKS. Working at full capacity and, I suppose, working as rapidly as possible. That is the evidence furnished me by private parties.

Mr. SHAFROTH. That would be only three shifts?

Mr. WEEKS. I think so.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. WEEKS. I do.

Mr. McCUMBER. If the ships are standardized so that parts can be made in any section of the United States, could not the tonnage capacity of the construction be greatly increased?

Mr. WEEKS. I have asked that question. Undoubtedly that would be true. I have asked how much tonnage would be constructed under the most favorable conditions with equal capacity and 5,000,000 tons is the amount that has been given. I think there is a fair indication that that is correct, because we are supposed to be constructing a million and a half tons now, and all our shipyards are working at full capacity. Many ships require more than a year for their construction. Therefore I think by working in three shifts it would be a fair indication that 5,000,000 tons probably would be all that they could construct.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I will state to the Senator from North Dakota that the testimony before the committee was that under the standardization plan after six months from beginning the construction a steel ship of large capacity, of over 5,000 tons, could be completed every day, making 365 ships in a year.

Mr. SMOOT. By one firm?

Mr. SHAFROTH. By one firm.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, there are at least four places in the bill where the President is authorized to make a just compensation or a reasonable compensation for the plant which may be taken over and for its services. I am going to offer an amendment in each case, which I will send to the desk and ask that it may lie on the table for the time being, providing that the compensation shall be limited to cost plus 8 per cent profit. I place the profit at 8 per cent, because that is the basis on which we commence to tax corporations in the excess-profits tax, and it seems to me that corporations which are to be taken over in this way should at least be entitled to earn what we have, in our wisdom, decided is a fair return on the capital invested before we commence to tax the excess profits.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President, I share in some degree the apprehension expressed by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS], based upon information that I understand comes from his State, and the same information seems to come from all the large centers of population of the United States, that the so-called liberty loan is not proceeding with the rapidity that all of us desire. But I do not believe that that fact is due to any proposition to vest in the President of the United States the necessary power to carry this war to a successful conclusion. My own judgment is that the more responsive Congress is to the suggestion of clothing the President with real power that he can utilize in the prosecution of this war the higher the credit of the United States will be.

I attribute any apathy upon that score rather to the fact that the people of the United States are fearful that our revenues are to be raised upon a false and unscientific basis, and that the first revenue bill the exigencies of the war demand will be so unscientific that the superstructure that undoubtedly will have to be constructed upon it later on will fall and topple because the foundation is weak.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. KNOX. Certainly.

Mr. WEEKS. I did not intend to assert that placing unusual powers in the hands of the President was anything more than a contributory cause to the uncertainty in the minds of citizens. I quite agree with the Senator that the main reason for the failure to float the bonds is due to the unscientific tariff or revenue bill which is now being considered.

Mr. KNOX. I do not concede that the measure we are discussing now is a contributory cause to apathy in respect to our proposed loan. As I said before, I believe that the more powers which can be used promptly and effectively for the prosecution of the war shall be placed in the hands of the President the higher the credit of the United States will rise.

Mr. President, it is a most extraordinary and unusual situation in which this Government finds itself. For the first time in its history it is called upon to take part in a war that has to be fought on foreign soil, or upon the high seas if it should so eventuate that the German Navy should overcome the British Navy and be set at large upon the sea. The present situation is that if we take any active manly part in the present conflict it must be upon the soil of France. How is it possible for us to reach the territory where the deed of valor of American men must be produced? It must be by ships. We must transport our troops and their supplies 3,000 miles or more across the Atlantic ocean. Our bottoms to-day are absolutely insufficient for any reasonable demand that may be made upon us for cooperation in this contest.

Mr. President, the coastwise vessels of the United States, the vessels engaged in commerce with South America, the vessels that carry our products to the Orient are all being drafted into the North Atlantic and made to serve the purposes of the war. While the war is the greatest adventure in which the United States is now engaged, we should not lose our heads and allow all other interests of the people and the Government to be lost sight of.

Mr. President, there is no danger in conferring the powers described in the shipping clauses of this bill. There is no danger, except to the United States, if they be withheld. The power, in my judgment, will never be used to its maximum extent. I doubt whether it will ever be drawn upon largely at all, because when you come to analyze it it is only after all the power of the Government to utilize the facilities of the shipyards of the country and of those enterprises which produce iron, steel, and other materials that go into the construction of ships, so that the Government may be served promptly and effectively.

Now, how is it as to the shipyards? We know perfectly well that we can not build ships any faster than the facilities of the shipyards will permit us. I have the statement of fact not only from the manufacturers who are engaged in manufacturing steel which enters into the construction of ships but the other materials which enter into that construction that they are prepared to-day to deliver to the United States material as rapidly as the facilities of the shipyards can use it.

Mr. President, a ship is a thing that can not be built in a day or a week or a month. The keels have to be laid upon the stocks, the material has to be assembled, the workmen have to put it into place, the armament, if it is an armored ship, the furnishing, and equipment have all got to be gathered together. If the Government is to proceed efficiently it must have the power which at least psychologically will induce prompt furnishing of goods, materials, and labor.

I doubt, sir, whether it will ever be necessary for the President of the United States to commandeer any shipyard, any rolling mill, any steel works, or any other factory in the United States to expedite this work, but it is a good thing in the event of the unforeseen happening that he shall have that power.

Mr. President, over and beyond all that, it is a good thing to have it go out to the nations of the world that the Congress of the United States is going to be true to its pledge written in the war resolution that all the resources of this country are pledged to victory for our arms.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. KIRBY] to the amendment is pending.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment as amended.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Let it be read as amended.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is the committee amendment.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The committee amendment as a whole.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I have an amendment which I desire to offer.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the committee amendment as amended.

Mr. SMOOT. Then, I ask for a reconsideration of the vote by which the committee amendment as amended was agreed to, because I desire to offer an amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The committee amendment as amended has not been agreed to, but the question is on agreeing to the committee amendment as amended.

Mr. PENROSE. How was the committee amendment amended, Mr. President?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The only way to give accurate information to the Senator from Pennsylvania would be to have the Secretary read the different amendments which have been proposed by the chairman of the committee.

Mr. PENROSE. Well, let them be read. There are several Senators here who would like a little information on the subject.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the amendment as amended and indicate in what particulars it has been amended.

The SECRETARY. On page 2, line 2, after the word "now," insert the words "constructed or," so that it will read:

The cost of purchasing or requisitioning ships now constructed or in the course of construction.

Mr. MARTIN. Was not the amendment which the Secretary read voted on and adopted?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary, at the request of the Senator from Pennsylvania, is stating the committee amendment as amended, the Senator from Pennsylvania desiring information on the subject.

Mr. MARTIN. All of those amendments to the committee amendment have been adopted.

The VICE PRESIDENT. All of those amendments have been adopted.

Mr. MARTIN. That is all right.

The SECRETARY. The next amendment to the committee amendment was, on page 3, line 6, after the numerals "$150,000," to insert the following proviso:

Provided, That this appropriation may be reimbursed from available funds under the War and Navy Departments turned over for the exclusive use of those departments or either of them.

On page 3, line 14, after the words "United States," insert "except those acquired by the Army or Navy."

On page 6 to insert as a separate paragraph, after line 3, the following:

(e) To purchase, requisition, and take over for use or operation by the United States all vessels or floating small craft now constructed, or any part thereof, at such reasonable price as shall be determined by the President.

On page 6, line 11, strike out the word "fifty" and insert "seventy-five," so that it will read:

Such person shall be paid 75 per cent of the amount so determined by the President.

On page 6, line 14, before the words "per cent," strike out "50" and insert "75."

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, in the amendments which the Secretary has just stated to the Senate as having been adopted, the one next to the last I was not able to clearly apprehend. Was the language used "all vessels or floating small craft"? Is that the phrase?

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is the language.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Without being able to locate it, I can not exactly see the force of that amendment. I should like to ask the Senator who offered the amendment what the idea is in adding the word "floating"? Does it mean that the President can take only vessels that are already in the water and not those small craft that are on the ways or in process of construction?

Mr. MARTIN. The language applies to completed vessels, undoubtedly.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I notice in other sections that the President is given authority to take vessels in any process of construction, and I wondered why it was desired to exclude smaller vessels and to limit the President to taking those only which had been completed and were afloat.

Mr. MARTIN. This includes large vessels as well as small ones; but it authorizes the President to take completed vessels, including small floating craft.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I do not see why the requirement that they should actually be afloat should be inserted. However, I do not care to criticize the language, because I know nothing about the matter.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I presume the reason for the insertion of this language is that it does not take long to build smaller vessels. Consequently there is no necessity of taking over small vessels during the course of construction; but as to larger vessels during the course of construction it may be necessary to do so.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. It seems to me the Senator from Colorado is arguing against his own view. I want to broaden the authority of the President so that he may take small craft, a submarine chaser, for instance, if she was on shore, on the stocks, or on the ways. The language of the bill would prohibit the President from taking her unless she was afloat in the water, as I should assume.

Mr. SHAFROTH. It seems to me the answer which I suggested is correct. It is for the reason that it does not take long to construct one of these small vessels, and it would be almost useless for the President to undertake commandeering them and getting them while they were being constructed.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. As I have said, I have no particular interest in the matter; but I did not know whether it was an error and a limitation that ought to be eradicated.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I offer the following amendment: On page 2, line 22, after the word "requisitioning," I move to insert "from any individual, association, partnership, or corporation," so that it will read:

The cost of purchasing or requisitioning from any individual, association, partnership, or corporation ships now constructed or in the course of construction and the expediting of construction of ships thus under construction shall not exceed the sum of $250,000,000.

Mr. KNOX. May I ask if that is intended to apply to vessels which are purchased by the Government, including ships that are on the stocks?

Mr. SMOOT. That is the object of the amendment.

Mr. President, if the Senate will indulge me for a short time, I desire to call attention to the testimony that was given before the committee on this subject. In doing so I shall take great pains not to read any testimony that has not already appeared in the public press. I am not going to violate the understanding that any confidential testimony given before the subcommittee should not be made public.

Mr. President, the program as mapped out by the Shipping Board is for the constrution of 3,000,000 tons of ships in the next 18 months. That includes steel ships and wooden ships as well. The contract price for the wooden ships will be about $135 a ton and for the steel ships it will be $153 a ton. Gen. Goethals made this statement in relation to the program:

Assuming that we must pay $150 a ton for steel ships, 3,000,000 tons will require $450,000,000, and I have fixed the round sum at $500,000,000 for the construction program. If we took over the ships that are now on the stocks—on the ways—assuming that the amount is a million tons and that we may have to go to $200 a ton in order to expedite it, I figure that at $250,000,000.

Senator SMOOT. That is the steel, you say?

Gen. GOETHALS. The steel.

Senator SMOOT. Have you counted the wood?

Gen. GOETHALS. The wood will come in on the $50,000,000 we have and part of this $500,000,000 that I have just asked for.

Senators will notice on page 3 of the bill, beginning on line 7, down to and including line 14, there is a provision appropriating $500,000,000 for the cost of construction of ships authorized therein. The previous paragraph authorizes the purchasing or requisitioning of ships and appropriates $250,000,000 for that purpose.

Mr. President, contracts which have been made up to date by Gen. Goethals are for 214,000 tons, and that was to be paid for out of the $50,000,000 appropriated to the Shipping Board for the purchasing of ships. Mr. Denman, the chairman of the board, has contracted for 72,000 tons, to be paid out of the same appropriation, making up to date, contracted for by both, 286,000 tons. Gen. Goethals said it was impossible for him to make any further contracts until there was another appropriation made, although he has arrangements made to enter into contracts to carry out the program of the 3,000,000 tons; and, as stated by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], the general stated that he intends to have some of these ships constructed outside of shipyards, for he called the attention of the committee to the fact that there was one bridge-building concern which is willing now to enter into contracts with the Government at a price of $153 per ton, to deliver in six months one steel ship of 5,000 tons capacity, and after that to deliver one ship of the same capacity every day so long as the Government may desire them. So there is no question as to our ability to have the ships built within the limit of 18 months, as provided in this program.

This, Mr. President, does not in any way have reference to the amount of shipping that is now under way. Gen. Goethals testified, as also did Mr. Denman, that the English contracts to-day uncompleted amount to 1,024,000 tons. That 1,024,000 tons is made up of 169 ships. Some of the 169 ships are nearing completion, while others are merely on the ways. Gen. Goethals said that the contracts were taken for the English Government by the Cunard Steamship Co., with the understanding that they were to be constructed on a basis of eight hours per day. The General thought that our ways were so congested that, unless the English Government gave authority to hasten construction and get them finished as soon as possible, it would block the construction of ships to be contracted for by our Government. So it would, and therefore he asked for authority to require the expediting of the building of these ships, which is granted to him by this bill. On page 7 of the bill, beginning with line 7, we grant this authorization:

The President may, in the execution of the powers hereby granted, in lieu of requisitioning ships now under construction in the United States for any citizen of the United States, or for the Government of any nation at war with Germany, or for any citizen of such nation so at war with Germany, expend the funds hereby authorized for such purpose in expediting the construction of such ships, under such arrangements and such agreements for repayment as he may deem wise and proper.

That is the authority given in this bill to hasten the construction of vessels contracted for by foreign Governments.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield.

Mr. CALDER. Has there been any testimony indicating the number of ships that are being constructed for other Governments than England?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; there are 64 other ships being constructed for Norway and other parties, making the number of ships being constructed in American shipyards under contract with foreign Governments and individuals 233 in all stages of construction.

Mr. CALDER. Does this bill contemplate taking over Norwegian and other foreign vessels under construction in this country?

Mr. SMOOT. It is contemplated under this bill to take over all of them. The authority is given under the bill, without my amendment, to take over all of those ships.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, what the Senator has read, if I understood him correctly, does not authorize taking over anything at all, but merely authorizes the expediting of the completion of the ships under Government order.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator is right, as far as the provision I read is concerned. Other parts of the bill authorize the requisitioning of any ship under construction in the United States. What I want to do is to give the power to the President to requisition all ships except those that are now being constructed under contract for Great Britain. The reason for that, Mr. President, is this: I can not see any advantage to our Government in taking over contracts that England has to-day for the building of 169 ships, of 1,024,000 tons, at a cost, on the average, of about $183 per ton, when the ships will be used for the same identical purpose, whether we own them or whether England owns them. The power granted in the provision that I have just read, authorizes the Shipping Board to hasten the construction of the English ships. Suppose we have to pay every dollar of expense, and suppose it costs $10 a ton additional to construct the ships under the expediting process, working three shifts, instead of one, that is a mere bagatelle compared with the payment for ships at $180 a ton, when the ordinary price in normal times is not to exceed $60 a ton.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me to suggest right there that, if we are looking at the matter purely from the financial standpoint, of course what the Senator says is absolutely true, but, remembering the dire straits of our ally in connection with the raising of such enormous sums of money as she has been raising, and the fact that nearly a million tons of her shipping is going down to the bottom of the ocean monthly, can the Senator see anything wrong in this great Government of ours relieving that ally from the immense strain involved in the payment for these vessels, even though they would be used in the same trade?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, if it were going to help in any way, I would not object; but shipping on the ocean will be the same whether England owns the ships or whether America owns them; but the Senator says——

Mr. McCUMBER. But it is a question of relieving an ally of such an enormous burden where it is taking all the suffering at the present time.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, we are relieving our allies. We have provided for a bond issue of $3,000,000,000 to relieve them. I think the ships will be used to assist our allies, but that is not all that Mr. Denman wants to take these ships over for. Mr. Denman testified that he desired the ships taken over because at the close of the war he wants those that are left and not torpedoed to be owned by the Government of the United States to handle our foreign commerce.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield.

Mr. KELLOGG. I should like to ask the Senator as to the 169 ships, representing 1,024,000 tons, whether he understands that they are all to be for the English Government or for English corporations?

Mr. SMOOT. They are all for the English Government, contracted for in the name of the Cunard Co.

Mr. KELLOGG. But for the English Government?

Mr. SMOOT. But for the English Government; there is no question as to that; in fact, the testimony will so show.

Mr. KELLOGG. Of the 64 ships outside that are under contract, are they for Governments or individuals?

Mr. SMOOT. I think there are about seven or eight of them for Governments and the others are individuals or corporations. I will say, by the way, also, that there are some of those ships which have been contracted for that are not on the ways, and Gen. Goethals stated that they were contracted for for speculative purposes.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Does the Senator refer to the Norwegian ships?

Mr. SMOOT. No; I am referring to ships contracted for by individuals.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator if he would not consider it of some advantage at the close of the war to have American owners possessed of a large merchant fleet in order to further our foreign commerce?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I desire to say to the Senator that when the war is over there will be no country on earth that will be able to build ships any faster than we can, and when the war is over and normal conditions exist, we will not have to pay $200 a ton for ships, but will be able to secure our merchant marine as fast as any other Government at a price not to exceed $60 per ton. So why purchase ships now for the merchant-marine trade after the war that will cost this Government $200 a ton, when we know that then they can be constructed at not to exceed $60 per ton? Other Governments will construct their ships in that way; and then our ships will enter into competition with those of other Governments constructing ships at $60 a ton, when ours will have cost us $200 a ton as far as the English ships that we may take over.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. They always have an advantage in cost over us.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, are not foreign Governments constructing all the ships they can find opportunity to construct at the present cost?

Mr. SMOOT. The foreign Governments are not constructing enough ships to-day to take the place of those that are submarined.

Mr. KELLOGG. They are constructing every ship they can and every ship they can contract for, are they not?

Mr. SMOOT. That I can not say. I noticed in the paper this morning a statement that Britain does not need ships.

Mr. KELLOGG. The Senator does not believe it, does he?

Mr. SMOOT. I will call attention to the item now. It is as follows:

BRITAIN DOESN'T NEED SHIPS.

All available American trans-Atlantic tonnage for the time being will be used to transport supplies to Russia, France, and Italy, under an arrangement about to be made by the American Government with the allies.

Mr. President, I do not know whether there is any arrangement to be made or not, but I do think it would be unfair, as I said in the committee, if the boats being constructed for England should be prohibited from carrying to France, Italy, and Russia food supplies and munitions of war. I can not think it is possible such an arrangement will be made. I think that the English should take the same chances by entering the danger zone the same as the American ships will be compelled to do. Why should we make an arrangement that our ships should be sent to France, to Italy, and to Russia, in the danger zone, and the other boats of our allies go to some other country less dangerous? It is not fair, and I do not believe that England is going to ask it. I believe that every ton of shipping that England has contracted for as soon as they are off the ways will go into the same shipping trade, for the same purposes, and for the same business that they would if we owned them. I wish to say further that I am in favor of forcing the completion of the English ships, because I believe with Lloyd-George that the need at the present time is "ships, ships, and yet more ships," and that that policy will be necessary to bring this war to a successful conclusion.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President, may I inquire of the Senator if it is not the position of Gen. Goethals and the Shipping Board that while we would have to pay, if we took these ships off the hands of Great Britain, a very much larger price than they could be built for under normal conditions, they are worth that price because of the tremendous earnings of which they are capable at this time?

My recollection is that we were told by Mr. Denman that about three voyages would pay for one of these ships, and that we were incurring no risk, because the insurance upon the ships was borne by the freight. So that if these vessels come through without destruction and they succeed in making at least three voyages, we will have the vessels practically for nothing, and we will be in a position after the close of this war to compete for the foreign trade of the world, which was the purpose, as is avowed by Great Britain, in having this class of vessels built in our country—so that at the end of the war the losses might be supplied from this source.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, these are the facts in the case: The insurance rates are exceedingly high, as they always are in war times. The freight carries an insurance to protect it. The ship carries an insurance to protect it. But, Mr. President, the Government of the United States is going to insure her ships, and if they are sunk we lose the whole of it.

Mr. KNOX. The Senator from Utah certainly does not mean to suggest that the ultimate loss would fall upon the Government of the United States. The ultimate loss must fall upon the munitions and other freight that are being carried over by these vessels.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the Senate voted the other day $50,000,000 for the purpose of enabling the Government to insure our over-seas commerce.

Mr. KNOX. They are making money out of it.

Mr. SMOOT. Well, I will say that they have not made money up to the present time on the fifteen millions that we first provided; and if they could not do it in times past I do not think it is possible to do it now, unless the submarine becomes less dangerous than it has been in the last month or two.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. Right in connection with the question of ships, I want to ask the Senator, for information, whether he or the committee or Gen. Goethals or any of the officials have given any consideration to the question whether it would be practicable, under the circumstances, to construct submarines for the purpose of carrying freight? Has there been any investigation of that question?

Mr. SMOOT. Not by the committee, nor was there any testimony bearing upon that subject presented. It never was mentioned in the hearings.

Mr. NORRIS. Now I should like to ask the Senator this question: Will the language of the bill authorize the President, if he considers it practicable after investigation, to use any of the funds appropriated in this bill for the purpose of constructing that kind of ship?

Mr. SMOOT. I doubt very much whether it would. The first appropriation of $250,000,000 is for the purchase and requisitioning of ships now under construction.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. SMOOT. Then the second appropriation, for $500,000,000, is for "the cost of construction of ships authorized herein."

Mr. NORRIS. Yes. I rather think the Senator is correct on that point; and I had in mind, and have prepared, an amendment that I have had printed, and it is lying on the table, giving the President the authority to do that if he thought it was advisable to do it.

Mr. SMOOT. I want to call the Senator's attention to the fact that there was an emergency sum, as I remember, of $100,000,000 appropriated in the Navy appropriation that could be used for the building of such submarines if the President so directed.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. He could use the entire emergency sum in the naval bill for the construction of submarines if he wished to do so.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; but that would mean a fighting submarine. The question I am asking the Senator does not pertain to a fighting submarine, although I presume it might be used for that purpose also, perhaps, without interfering much with its freight capacity. But the Deutschland made a couple of trips across the ocean, and it made the trips in the face of the fact that the entire world knew that it was making the trips, and the greatest navy in the world was watching all across the ocean to attack it. It was at least successful a couple of times.

It seems to me that under present conditions a submarine could go across the larger portion of its course on the surface of the water, and that we would thereby avoid the high insurance rates. The submarine could not carry as much freight, it is true, and it would take more ships, but the committee ought to consider it. I think the country ought to consider the fact that these surface ships that are carrying freight are going down at an enormous rate; and I have wondered why it would not be a good thing at least to give the President in this bill the authority to construct ships of that kind if he thought it advisable.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to say a word to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. In my opinion, the Senator from Utah is wrong in his limited construction of the provisions of the bill. It will be seen on page 3, at line 17, under the definitions, that "the word 'ship' shall include any boat or vessel and the parts thereof." I think there can be no question that a submarine commerce carrier would be a boat or a vessel.

Mr. NORRIS. I should like to ask the Senator—the chairman of the committee is not in the Chamber at present—if he knows whether there would be any objection from the committee if, without making it compulsory, an express provision were placed in the bill giving that power to the President?

Mr. SMOOT. I should like to have the Senator address that question to the chairman of the committee, because I have no authority to accept amendments.

Mr. NORRIS. The chairman is not in the Chamber now. I should like the Senator to give the matter some consideration. I expect to offer that amendment before the bill is finally disposed of.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. SMOOT. Just a moment. I want to say to the Senator that since he offered his amendment to the Navy appropriation bill, I believe——

Mr. NORRIS. No; it was to this bill.

Mr. SMOOT. To this bill, was it? I have thought of the question of carrying merchandise across the ocean by submarines, and I have come to the conclusion that the expense would be so great that we had better take our chances of having our regular ships sunk by a torpedo from a submarine than to undertake to try to carry across the ocean great quantities of grain and heavy merchandise in submarines.

Mr. NORRIS. Of course I know we would be greatly handicapped, but the danger of being sunk by a submarine would be almost entirely gone. We could not carry as much in a ship, that is true; but from the fact——

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. They might be sunk by our American destroyers.

Mr. NORRIS. But from the fact that for only a small part of the journey would there be any danger whatever, it seems to me, for instance, that insurance rates would go away down; and, while it would be a work of rather a desperate nature, at the same time we are in a desperate condition, with the submarines destroying the vessels floating on top of the ocean.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. But the Senator knows that the very ship to which he has alluded, the German submarine Deutschland, which was a commercial submarine, was captured.

Mr. NORRIS. I believe it was; yes; but the very fact that the Deutschland came across the ocean with the entire world knowing within an hour of the time it started, with all the sea covered with enemy vessels searching for it night and day, and that it got through, and, in fact, got through twice, as the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON] says, is a remarkable proposition. Now, a submarine going across the ocean in behalf of our Government or our allies would be traveling over almost the entire distance without the possibility of an enemy ship disturbing its course; so it seems to me that if the Deutschland, under those circumstances, could get through, we ought to have a thousand of them going through every month.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. SMOOT. I do.

Mr. WEEKS. I see no reason why the amendment which the Senator from Nebraska states he is going to offer should not be accepted. Several submarines, for trade purposes, other than the Deutschland and the Bremen, have been constructed, one of 5,000 tons capacity. It has not crossed the ocean, but even larger ones are under consideration and have been under consideration; and it has been seriously proposed by European countries to build submarines of 10,000 tons capacity. Nobody knows whether they can be operated successfully or not, but the experiment is worth trying, and I see no reason why the amendment should not be inserted in the bill, because it may be a coming way of handling such questions in time of war.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. KENYON. I should like to ask the Senator from Massachusetts a question along the line of the suggestion of the Senator from Connecticut. What is the need of any such amendment, in view of the fact that on page 3 of the bill it is stated that "the word 'ship' shall include any boat or vessel and the parts thereof," and a boat is any kind of a water craft?

Mr. WEEKS. I came into the Chamber while this discussion was under way. I do not know that there is any need of it, but I understood the Senator from Nebraska to say that there might be some doubt about his authority.

Mr. NORRIS. I think there is some doubt.

Mr. WEEKS. And, therefore, I understood he wanted to have it cleared up.

Mr. SMOOT. I think there is doubt.

Mr. KENYON. I do not see what kind of a doubt there can be, when a boat is any kind of a water craft, and the word "ship" under the terms of the bill includes any boat or vessel.

Mr. NORRIS. If the Senator from Utah will yield again for just a moment——

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. It seems to me that even though the Senator from Iowa and the Senator from Connecticut have no doubt, the fact that such a provision was specifically put in the bill would call it to the attention of the President and the other officers of the Government who had to do with the matter, and they would be more apt to give it consideration than they would if it were not included and would have to be put in by some construction of the language that is already there.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield.

Mr. KENYON. Would it not be a good plan, then, to set aside a certain amount for the construction of that kind of vessel, if the desire is simply to emphasize it?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, in line with the suggestion of the Senator from Iowa, if I may have the attention of the Senator from Massachusetts for a minute, he knows a good deal more about these things than most of us do. Can he inform me whether commercial subsea cargo carriers of, say, 4,000 tons could be built at present in this country in any numbers? As I understand, there are only two companies in this country that build any kind of a subsea vessel for war purposes, known as the submarine. Those companies are the Lake Co. and the Electric Boat Co., and their inventions are controlled by patents. Would it be possible within a year, say, for the United States to build 10 commercial vessels of 4,000 tons each which would be submarines?

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, the commercial shipyards build these submarines. The Electric Boat Co. does not build them. The Electric Boat Co. gets the contract and then the building is actually done by some of our shipyards, so there is no reason why they should not build any number, provided they have the power to do it by legislation, and the right to use the patents, which I suppose would be granted.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The Electric Boat Co. or its subsidiaries build the engines of the submarines, however.

Mr. WEEKS. Yes; I think so.

Mr. SMOOT. That is what they do.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Before the Senator from Utah takes up the line of his argument again will he be kind enough to indicate the words he would like to have inserted, so that I can see the force of them?

Mr. SMOOT. On page 2, line 22, after the word "requisitioning," I propose to insert the words "from any individual, association, partnership, or corporation."

Mr. BRANDEGEE. What does the Senator intend to accomplish by the insertion of those words?

Mr. SMOOT. My intention is to allow this appropriation of $250,000,000 to be used in the purchasing or requisitioning of any ship in the United States belonging to an individual, association, partnership, or corporation.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. In process of construction.

Mr. SMOOT. In process of construction; but it will prevent the purchasing or requisitioning of ships on our ways under contract to a foreign Government.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I do not think it would, unless other parts of the bill were changed also.

Mr. SMOOT. We will come to that later on. We will get this amendment first—that is, if the Senate agrees to it.

Mr. GALLINGER. If we can.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

When I was interrupted, Mr. President, I was referring to the fact that Mr. Denman desired the taking over of these English ships in order that we may have them at the close of the war to enter into our export trade. I read from page 122 of the hearings.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, right there, as the Senator is suggesting as a reason that we should have these ships at the end of the war, is he not going upon the assumption that those ships will still be in existence; and does he recognize the fact that that number of ships are being sunk every month in this war?

Mr. SMOOT. I recognize the fact that perhaps half of them will be torpedoed and destroyed before the war is over, and in that case there would be 500,000 tons instead of 1,000,000 tons that we would take over from Great Britain, if they were all taken over. This is what Mr. Denman said upon the question of the desire that the ships should be owned by the Government at the close of the war:

> Now, the Government has the ships at the end of the war, or the survivors, will have that much advantage in the trade. The British would like to have that, and so would we. But we must remember that when we come to the end of the war it will be not with the millions of tons we have now, and not with the stimulation that Gen. Goethals will give us, but it will be with what the submarine leaves us, and it is probable we will not have 2,000,000 tons at the end of the war to go out into commerce.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, the Senator does not read in a loud enough tone to be heard.

Mr. SMOOT. If it were not for the conversation going on in the Chamber, I think I could be heard.

On page 129—and this was the first day of the hearing—Gen. Goethals took virtually the same position, and at that time the policy was questioned by me. I am not going to read my statement again, as I have already read it to the Senate. Then, the next day, when the draft of the bill was before us, the General testified as follows—this following a recommendation made by Mr. Denman that we take over the English ships, because of the fact that in so doing we would have the ships at our command after the close of the war, and they could be put into the foreign trade:

> Gen. GOETHALS. Senator, would you mind our doing this, taking over in the shipyards all shipping not contracted for by England or English firms——
> Senator SMOOT. Every pound of it.
> Gen. GOETHALS. And authorizing us to expend money to expedite the completion of British ships that are on the ways?
>
> Senator SMOOT. Undoubtedly.
> Gen. GOETHALS. All right, then. Give me that, and make my appropriation $100,000,000 and my authorization $750,000,000, and let me do that.
> Senator SMOOT. That is what I think you should do.

Mr. President, I do not want to repeat what I had gotten halfway through saying when I was interrupted; but from a business standpoint I can not see why we should go to work and pay $200 a ton for the ships that are already contracted for by the British Government and the construction of which this bill authorizes us to expedite, even if we have to pay for it ourselves, when the same ships when completed will enter into the same trade and for the same purpose as if we owned them ourselves.

Mr. Denman made the statement that perhaps England would take those ships and put them into some other trade. It is unthinkable, Mr. President, to even suggest such a thing. England is just as much interested in bringing this war to a close as the United States, and the United States is just as much interested in bringing it to a close as England.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. SMOOT. I do.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Is not England even a little more interested in having food go to England?

Mr. SMOOT. I want to go as far as I did, but I could go further. To suggest that England, with her very life depending upon food and upon munitions of war, would take her ships out of this trade and put them into a more profitable and safer trade and ask the United States Government to build ships or take over her ships and put them in the danger zone is unthinkable.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. SMOOT. I do.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator will permit me, I have neither read nor heard the testimony recited. Did Gen. Goethals specifically say that there were a million tons?

Mr. SMOOT. One million and twenty-four thousand tons, he said, and so did Mr. Denman. In fact, I will read his testimony.

Mr. GALLINGER. I take the Senator's word without his reading. Now, $200 a ton is a fabulous amount. When we were contending here for a rehabilitation of the American merchant marine, and trying to pass the bill which the Merchant Marine Commission prepared, we could have gotten ships at $45 a ton. One million tons, at $200 a ton, would be $200,000,000.

Mr. SMOOT. Two hundred million dollars.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. Mr. President, $200 a ton is in excess of what is the fact in regard to the cost to-day. I understood the Senator to say $183 a ton.

Mr. SMOOT. I stated that Gen. Goethals testified that he could make contracts for the building of steel ships at $153 a ton for the Government of the United States.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. Yes. These ships costing $200 a ton now are being built for the British, are they not?

Mr. SMOOT. The British contracts to-day run from $170 up to $200 a ton.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. That may be, but the Senator is putting them all at $200 a ton. The fact is that they are not costing that; and when you come to take the freights I think you will find that the freights to-day—and the present freights are likely to continue—will be equal to, if not greater than, the cost of the ships. I am referring to the advance in the freights and the amounts received for freights. In other words, as a business proposition, a man can build a ship at the present price and get the present freights and make more money than he could at the old cost of building ships and at the old freights.

Mr. SMOOT. Nobody has ever doubted that.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. But the Senator was speaking just as a business proposition. I think, as a business proposition, that ships built at the present price can make more money at the present freights than they could at the old cost of building and the old freights.

Mr. SHAFROTH and Mr. GALLINGER addressed the Chair.

Mr. SMOOT. Just a moment.

Mr. GALLINGER. I want to ask the Senator a question in that same connection. Does the Senator know what the tonnage of these ships is to be?

Mr. SMOOT. Each ship?

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes; or the average ship.

Mr. SMOOT. The wooden ships are to be of 5,000 tons and the steel ships are to be from 5,000 to 11,000 tons. I will say to the Senator that Gen. Goethals stated that it was safer to have a large ship, say, 15,000 tons, for the reason that such a ship could be built in compartments, and if a submarine torpedoed it, if the compartment doors were closed the boat would not sink, and therefore he thought it was safer in the end to have some larger vessel.

Mr. GALLINGER. That looks like a good business proposition. I will ask the Senator if some of these ships contracted for by the Cunard Co. are wooden ships?

Mr. SMOOT. No; none of them. They are all steel ships.

Mr. GALLINGER. So that if the average is 8,000 tons there would be 125 ships?

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that there are 169 ships.

Mr. GALLINGER. Then they do not average 8,000 tons apiece?

Mr. SMOOT. No; they do not.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. SMOOT. I do.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Let me suggest to the Senator from Utah that when the Senator from Maryland says these ships will make profits he is mistaken. It is not going to be done. We are going to take over these ships. We are not going to let private individuals or corporations operate them. We are going to oprate them. We are going to make a reasonable rate. If, as a matter of fact, they are operated under charter, there will be a specific requirement that the rate shall not be more than a certain amount, and you can not make a profit on any $200-a-ton ships in competition in the merchant-marine service when they can be built at $50 or $60 a ton.

Mr. SMOOT. The proposition of the Senator is this: That I could go to work and buy sugar to-day and stock up on it and pay $10 a hundred pounds for it, according to the conditions existing to-day, and I could make more profit on it than I could in ordinary times when I paid $5 a hundred pounds for sugar. Of course I could; but does the Senator think that I would go to work and buy enough sugar at $10 to last me beyond the period when I knew that sugar would be $5? Why, I would lose that amount of money, and anyone knows it who can see a business proposition.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President——

Mr. SMOOT. I yield to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. But did not the Senator also state that we can build them ourselves at $153 a ton?

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The same vessel as to which it is proposed that we shall pay $200 for somebody else's contract?

Mr. SMOOT. And ships that will be better adapted to our trade.

Mr. MARTIN (from his seat). The Senator is not accurate about that.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator from Virginia says I am not accurate. I am going to see whether I am accurate or not. I do not want the Senator from Virginia to take any word of mine, nor do I want the Senator from Georgia to take my word.

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. President, I do not think there is any use in the Senator consuming any time about that. I simply meant to say that there was no statement that all of these English ships cost $200 a ton. They cost varying prices, but there was no testimony before the committee to the effect that they cost $200 a ton.

Mr. SMOOT. The testimony before the committee was that they cost from $170 to $200 a ton.

Mr. MARTIN. Well, that is not all $200 a ton.

Mr. SMOOT. That is exactly what I said.

Mr. MARTIN. The Senator said $200 a ton. There was no statement before the committee that they cost $200 a ton.

Mr. SMOOT. I said that they cost $200 a ton in this way—and I will prove it by Gen. Goethals: He said that if the authority were given to him and the extra force of men not on the eight-hour-day plan, but a forced construction to expedite them, they would cost $200 a ton. The construction of these ships requires money.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon me——

Mr. SMOOT. Just a moment, until I get through with my statement, and then I will yield to the Senator. I read from the hearing before the committee:

The CHAIRMAN. These figures do not contemplate anything for taking over the 2,000,000 tons of construction?

Gen. GOETHALS. No, sir; that is new construction; and I also want to take over the yards and push forward some of the ships to completion and lay down new ships in those yards. Now, if there are 1,600,000 tons under construction now and I want to take over 1,000,000 tons of that at $180 a ton, I want $180,000,000 for that.

Senator SMOOT. But there is a question there. As long as the English contracts for 1,024,000 tons are in existence, why not let England keep that tonnage, for they want to carry on the same identical business that we want to carry on if we own those same boats? In other words, why not let England take her chances of having one-half of that million tons sunk instead of us? I know what Mr. Denman said here to-day, that of course the war will come to a close, and whatever is then left of this 1,000,000 tons, if we took it over now, we would have then to put it in our trade.

Gen. GOETHALS. I feel very much that way, because I want a merchant marine among other things.

That was the average price, he said at the time, in taking over the million tons, including the 600,000 tons that were under contract by Norway and individual firms in the United States, and leaving 400,000 tons that were being contracted for by England, making the million tons for $180,000,000, but this does not take into consideration the extra cost for forced construction.

Mr. MARTIN. That is $180 a ton.

Mr. SMOOT. One hundred and eighty dollars without cost for forced construction.

Mr. President, I know it will be stated that Gen. Goethals has asked that he be given the power to take over the English ships under construction. I know he said that perhaps he would not take over certain of the ships that were nearing completion, but he wanted the power to take over all the ships, so that he could get them off the ways. We give the power to do that, but I do believe that after giving the power England ought to take her own ships and pay for her own contracts, and run and manage her own ships that are under contract at the present high prices, and let us make contracts at not to exceed $153 a ton and build the program mapped out for the 3,000,000 tons within 18 months. If that is done no one will be hurt, and the shipping interests of this country and our allies will be sustained. There will not be one ton more nor one ton less to be used by ourselves and our allies.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Was not the suggestion made that the construction could be speeded up by Gen. Goethals taking over the work?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; and that is why we give the authority on page 7. The speeding up will be pushed even if the English ships are not taken over by us. In other words, instead of requisitioning these ships we give Gen. Goethals the authority to compel the expediting of their construction.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the junior Senator from Georgia?

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly.

Mr. HARDWICK. We give him power to expend the money but the power of Congress to commandeer men and materials is not given in connection with the British ships.

Mr. SMOOT. The power is given to commandeer any factory or contract.

Mr. HARDWICK. I know, but not to expedite construction.

Mr. SMOOT. If we commandeer them we can do anything we please. There is not a factory in the United States now——

Mr. HARDWICK. That is the very point in this controversy. I think the Senator is wrong about that.

Mr. SMOOT. Let us see:

All ships constructed, purchased, or requisitioned under authority herein, or heretofore or hereafter acquired by the United States, shall be managed, operated, and disposed of as the President may direct.

That is the power after they have been purchased or they have been requisitioned. Let us see what the power is that is conferred upon the President.

Mr. HARDWICK. On page 7.

Mr. SMOOT. No; let us begin with page 4:

The President is hereby authorized and empowered, in addition to all other existing provisions of law—

(a) Within the limits of the amounts herein authorized, to place an order with any person for such ships or material as the necessities of the Government, to be determined by the President, may require and which are of the nature, kind, and quantity usually produced or capable of being produced by such person. Compliance with all such orders shall be obligatory on any person to whom such order is given, and such order shall take precedence over all other orders and contracts except those intended to supply the Army and Navy of the United States placed with such person. If any person owning, leasing, or operating any factory equipped for the building or production of ships or material shall refuse or fail to give to the United States such preference in the execution of such order, or shall refuse to build, supply, furnish, or manufacture the kind, quantities or qualities of the ships or material so ordered, at such reasonable price as shall be determined by the President, the President may take immediate possession of any factory of such person, or any part thereof without taking possession of the entire factory, and may use the same at such times and in such manner as he may consider necessary or expedient.

(b) Within the limits of the amounts hereby authorized, to modify, cancel, or requisition any existing contract for the building, production, or purchase of ships or material; and if any contractor shall refuse or fail to comply with the contract as so modified or requisitioned, the President may take immediate possession of any factory of such contractor or any part thereof without taking possession of the entire factory, and may use the same for such time and in such manner as he may consider necessary or expedient.

(c) To require the owner or occupier of any factory in which ships or materials are built or produced to place at the disposal of the United States the whole or any part of the output of such factory and, within the limits of the amounts hereby authorized, to deliver such output or part thereof in such quantities and at such times as may be specified in the order, at such reasonable prices as shall be determined by the President.

Mr. President, there is no need for my going any further in the reading of the bill.

Mr. HARDWICK. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly.

Mr. HARDWICK. I am going to argue this question at length in answer to the Senator, but I want to give the Senator the contention I am going to make. I contend—and I get it from the language of this bill—that no one of those powers can be used on the ships of the British. On the contrary, I say that the language on page 7, with relation to the expedition of the British ships, just says he can spend the money.

Mr. SMOOT. Even if that were the case there is no question but that every shipbuilder in the United States, if Gen. Goethals would go to them and say, "We will pay you for the extra expense in hastening the construction of these ships," would do it, particularly if those shipbuilding concerns are working only eight hours a day. But my information is that they are working more than eight hours a day, and if the question of one shift applies to the contract that was given to Great Britain, Great Britain could not force them to work more than one shift a day. That was for the protection of the shipbuilders. They did not know what trouble they might have with labor or whether they could secure men sufficient to put their plants upon two shifts or three shifts.

There is not a shipbuilding concern in the United States but what if they had orders to keep their plants running 24 hours a day, and they could secure men, would gladly do it. Why? Because it is to their advantage to do it. The general overhead expenses, if running eight hours, or 24 hours per day, are the same, the taxes are the same, and those items alone are a fair profit within themselves. The greater the production of any factory or any mill the less the goods can be made for, and the greater the profit upon a contract at a given price.

So, Mr. President, I am in hopes that the amendment I have offered will be adopted, because I feel positive that it will not make one day's difference in the completion of the 1,024,000 tons of ships that are contracted for by the British Government. England will own the ships, England will pay the exorbitant price, and it will allow us to contract for additional ships at not to exceed $153 a ton. We will have them built just as quickly as if we ourselves took over the contract from England.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I did not quite understand the statement the Senator made. Under the provision of the bill, as I understand it, the President has the right to modify any existing contract with the shipyards, and he has the right also to commandeer the yard if they do not furnish proper terms. Under that, even if the British contract did provide that the vessel should be constructed upon an eight-hour day, the President could modify the contract and say, "You must run three shifts." In that case, we certainly would get the British ships a good deal quicker than we would get them if the British contract were allowed to creep along to completion according to the contract.

Mr. SMOOT. It is the intention of Gen. Goethals to force the building of ships.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I understood the Senator to say that we would not get them a day quicker under the terms of the bill than we would if his amendment was adopted.

Mr. SMOOT. No; I said we would not get them a day quicker if we took them over than we would if we allowed the contracts of England to be executed under the bill, which authorizes the speeding up of construction.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Why not? If we take them over and put three shifts of men on them, why would we not get them more quickly than we would if it was limited to one shift?

Mr. SMOOT. Under the bill authorization is given to require three shifts, even if title remains in England.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. But when you contract with them the shipyard contractor says it is a part of his contract that he will put but one shift on, and he can not be required to put more.

Mr. SMOOT. That is not the case.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Has it been modified since then?

Mr. SMOOT. Authorization is given to expedite the finishing of the ships even though England is to retain the ownership. We may have to pay the cost, but it will not amount to very much per ton.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Then I would see little difference between paying this extra bounty to expedite the building of ships or continuing them at the British contract price.

Mr. SMOOT. There is all the difference in the world. To expedite them would not cost over $10 a ton, and at the end of the war instead of being $180 at the very least, if they are expedited, or $200 a ton, they can be built then for $50 or $60 a ton.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. If the Senator will allow me just to make a statement about expediting ships right now, I do not know of any statement in the record which shows that these ships will cost $200 a ton except the single statement where Gen. Goethals said to expedite the ships might make them cost $200 a ton. The ships on the ways, as he said, would cost about $150 or $153 a ton. The difference in expediting these ships, then, would be nearly $50 a ton. We would have to pay for expediting the British ships if we did not take them.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator will permit me, has not the Cunard Co. made a contract at a higher amount than $150?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do not know.

Mr. SMOOT. At $170 to $200.

Mr. GALLINGER. I think they have. So the difference would not be so great as the Senator suggests.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. It may be $25, but we would pay it for the benefit of the British Government instead of the benefit of our Government.

Mr. GALLINGER. We certainly would.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, with a great deal of the argument made by the Senator from Utah I am in sympathy. I do not believe that as an ordinary business or commercial proposition it is sound, common, practical sense to be building a merchant marine during these times at a cost of from $170 to $200 a ton, subject to all the perils of the seas in these dangerous times. So I do not for one minute resist most of the argument made by the Senator from Utah.

However, it seems to me, Mr. President, that Lloyd George was right when he said that the fate of this war is bound up in the shipping question; that the way to win the war is to build ships, ships, ships, and then ships. If we are to win the war, if our allies are to win it, we must do all in our power to get the largest amount of shipping at the earliest practicable moment. Any pennywise policy now may prove to be pound foolish when the sum total is made up.

Now, what is the situation? The British Government, or, speaking more correctly, the Cunard Co., controlled, I think, and largely owned by the British Government, has something like a million tons of shipping under construction in this country. The contracts range in price from $170 to $200 per ton, as stated by the Senator from Utah. I believe somewhere in the testimony it will be found, if it is carefully examined, that Gen. Goethals stated his judgment was that it was about $173 a ton on an average.

Mr. SMOOT. One hundred and eighty-three dollars.

Mr. HARDWICK. My recollection is $173; but the Senator may be right. These contracts are made on the basis of eight hours a day labor. Some of them are not to be completed in 18 months, and yet they have filled up our shipyards, and these ships or the beginnings of them fill our ways.

The Senator from Utah says that every power conferred upon the President of the United States to commandeer labor and material and factories in behalf of American ships, ships to be built and owned and operated during the period of this war, can also be used by him for the construction of these British ships, if I understand his contention correctly. The Senator is in error in that, I think. He read the powers, a, b, c, d, and e, of the pending bill, different ways and different methods and powers by which the President of the United States can commandeer practically every resource of this great country to construct American ships, but when it comes to these foreign ships the situation is very different.

On page 7 of the bill you will find that—

> The President may, in the execution of the powers hereby granted, in lieu of requisitioning ships now under construction in the United States for any citizen of the United States, or for the Government of any nation at war with Germany, or for any citizen of such nation so at war with Germany, expend the funds hereby authorized for such purpose in expediting the construction of such ships.

In other words, if these ships were our ships, built by us, in the process of construction by us, under the law we propose here the President of the United States can practically commandeer every material resource of the country to expedite their speedy construction and completion; but we can not do that for a British ship. We can not confer these great powers for that purpose. When it came to giving the power to expedite these British contracts the only thing the committee felt they could recommend was that the President of the United States could spend money to do that, and make such agreements as he could with foreign governments as he thought wise, for the repayment of that money——

Mr. STONE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. HARDWICK. I yield.

Mr. STONE. Why could not the foreign government pay the money, as well as our Government, to expedite the construction?

Mr. HARDWICK. It can and it ought to, and it is the intention of this section that it shall. It was merely intended, as we amended it in the committee, to expend these funds to expedite the construction of these vesels, "under such arrangements and such agreements for repayment as he"—the President—"may deem wise and proper."

We did not think and we do not believe the Senate will think or Congress will think that we ought to take this tremendous power to commandeer men and material and factories and put it at the disposal of any foreign government or any subject or citizen of a foreign government. We were willing to confer it for the construction of American ships, but not for the construction of British ships, whether owned by the British Government or by a British corporation.

If it becomes important to speed this construction in a way that mere money alone can not speed it, if it becomes important to commandeer labor and material and factories and to apply the most complete and arbitrary powers, if need be, to speed the construction of these ships, we can do it, and we ought to do it if they are American ships; but we can not do it and ought not to do it if they are British ships. If it becomes important to have the British ships at once, why, we had better take them over, even if we lose a few dollars a ton, if we can secure them quicker by doing it. That is the only reason I see for leaving this power in this bill. I agree with the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], entirely, heartily, and completely, that under ordinary conditions we ought not to do it; that it would be poor policy to acquire a merchant marine for use at present prices, that may or may not be in existence after this war is over; but if it is necessary in order to carry this war to a successful conclusion, then these British ships ought to be commandeered without much regard to the difference in cost.

That is the reason which induced me, after considerable reflection, to side with the majority of the subcommittee in this matter and to agree to report this bill with this power in it. I believe it is right. I do not think they ought to use it, except in those cases where it is impossible by the mere use of money alone to so speed up British construction as to meet the demands and the requirements and the necessities of the hour. If there are such cases where money alone will not accomplish it, then we ought to take them over, no matter what government owns the contracts or what firms or corporations are interested in them.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President——

Mr. HARDWICK. I yield to the Senator from New York.

Mr. CALDER. For the information of the Senator from Georgia, I would say that I know of at least one shipyard which is manufacturing British ships and working its men 12 hours a day—an eight-hour workday, and four additional hours, for which the men are receiving double pay.

Mr. HARDWICK. Yes; and I am going to say to the Senator from New York frankly, and also to the Senator from Utah, that I believe in most cases it can be done in that way. It is hard for me to see many cases where mere money alone will not do it; but I can see how it might be possible in a moment of grave national peril that money alone could not do it. Then, I think, the last atom of governmental power ought to be behind the administration and Government to accomplish it, for, as Lloyd George said, "The secret of success in this war is ships, ships, and more ships," and if we can get enough ships, and get them quickly, I believe we shall have solved the problem and shall win the war. For that reason I think we had better leave this power as it is. I do not think the President will abuse it. It does not seem to me like anybody with one ounce of sense could insist on taking over these British ships as a mere commercial proposition. We do not intend for them to do that; I do not think they intend to do it. Certainly if anybody does so intend to do it, employing the service of this Government, they ought not to be permitted to do it, and I have no idea that President Wilson would permit it; he certainly ought not to do so. Still it will be safer to give him this power to be used only if the necessities of the war shall require is use.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I shall detain the Senate but for a moment. I think this is the most important amendment which has been offered to the bill, and the most far reaching.

On the question of our taking over these foreign ships I desire to say that we may have to take them over at an increased cost; but if we do take them over it will be because we need them. They will be put into the carrying trade to carry munitions, to carry provisions, to carry foodstuffs, and the cargoes will be insured.

The insurance is going to be paid and taken out whether they fly the British flag or the American flag, and the insurance is going to be paid at the same rate. In the end, if one of these ships goes down, it is not going to be paid for by the United States or the British Government, but it is going to be paid for by the insurance company which has insured it. That insurance company will be recouped for its losses out of the tremendous freight receipts which these vessels are getting to-day.

As everybody knows, the private owners of ships to-day are not anxious to sell their ships, notwithstanding the danger of submarine warfare. In fact, we have to put provisions into this bill conferring the right to commandeer in order that we may be sure of getting the ships. Why do the owners not want to sell them to the Government? It is because there is tremendous profit in these ships. It was stated before the committee that a ship will go to a dock and make its own selection of the highest-priced freight that it can carry and then will put on that freight as a freight charge "everything that the traffic will bear." That is the reason that individuals do not want the Government to take over these ships. Therefore, if we put them in the trade, we are not going to take any risks. If they are not sunk, of course this traffic will pay for them, and the insurance companies will pay for them if they are sunk. If they survive the war, our use of them is going to pay for these ships a good many times over, because some of these ships are paying for themselves on one voyage. Therefore, if they survive the war, instead of having a high-priced ship we will have a ship that has either entirely or largely paid for itself by its carrying capacity during the term of the war.

Mr. STONE. I do not quite understand the Senator from Alabama saying that the ship owned by the Government will pay for itself in a single voyage or in several voyages.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I mean by that that if the Government, as it will do with a large number of these ships, hires them out to private persons to run them and makes the private persons take the risk, makes the private persons pay the contract in that way, it will pay for them. On the other hand, if the Government itself does not have the ship to use, it has got to pay the customary high price to carry the cargo. So it does not make any difference which end of the equation you take, the result is the same.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Will the Senator from Alabama yield to me?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will.

Mr. SHAFROTH. If the Government is to charter a ship and an individual is going to run it, the individual and not the Government is going to make the profit. Is not that true?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I take it if the Government charters the ship it is going to charter it at existing rates and it will make the usual profit.

Mr. SHAFROTH. But does the Senator believe that, if the Government charters the ship, it will not put a limitation upon the freight rates which can be charged by it in order to furnish food to our allies at a cheap price, and ought it not to do so?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I think there will be an effort on the part of the Government to reduce the existing shipping rates; but even then those rates will be high. If we are going to reduce existing shipping rates there is all the more reason that we should have these ships at this time if they are needed.

Mr. SHAFROTH. But from the standpoint of profit you could not figure a profit out of it for the Government under those circumstances.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I take it that the Government is not going to recharter these ships without making some profit, and a profit commensurate with the risk that the ship is taking. Of course there would not be any business sense in doing otherwise. But that is not the real problem involved in this controversy. We are trying to get rid of contracts that fill the ways of our shipyards so that we can accomplish a result. If we rely solely on section 7 of this bill, the Senator from Utah is right; we can expedite the building of these ships, but we have got to pay the price for it whether the other Government wants to pay it or not. It probably will pay it back, but it might not. If it did, there would be no loss; if it did not, we want the ways cleared, and it would be our loss. Why should we shackle the hands of this Government at this time in the effort to clear the ways of this shipping? Can not the Senate assume that the men who are going to have charge of this work are not going to take over a British ship if it is not to the interest of this Government to do so, and that they are going to take over or commandeer British ships when it is to the interest of the Government to do so?

Mr. SMOOT. Will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes.

Mr. SMOOT. Does the Senator really believe that if the President of the United States should ask England to expedite the building of these ships England would not do it?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Well, I have no doubt of England's doing it; but there are private contracts which exist between the shipbuilding companies of this country and the Cunard Steamship Line. When Gen. Goethals tells us that it is of the utmost importance that he be given this power, I do not think he wants the power simply for the purpose of trying to coerce the British Government when he says that the British Government is prepared and ready to cooperate with him in this respect.

There is something else behind it, and there is something else behind the fact that we have to fight here to get the power to commandeer these ships. I do not refer to the Senator from Utah, of course.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator knows that I have stated time and again that I am perfectly willing to give the necessary power. My amendment does not apply to individuals, associations, corporations, or partnerships.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Certainly. I am not referring to the Senator at all; but if the contract has been made with the Cunard Ship Co., which is a corporation, the Senator's amendment would not mean anything, because the contract is with a British corporation and not with the British Government. That is recognized by everybody. Of course, I know and the Senator knows that the British Government is the owner of the Cunard company now.

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. But on its face it would not mean anything. Then, if it does not mean anything, why put it in here? But if behind its face it means something, then if we adopt this amendment we are shackling the hands of the executive officers unnecessarily. The only issue involved, as I see it, the only argument the Senator from Utah has made as to why we should not do this, is that at the end of the war we will find on our hands some high-priced ships. Well, I do not think that is a reason why we should not do it. I do not think we can stop to count the cost of the ships after the war is over. What we want is the ships to-day.

But there is another argument in favor of the committee proposal. As I said awhile ago, these ships in all probability, if they survive the war, will have earned more than their cost of construction by the time the war is over.

I would not be insistent on the proposition, if I did not feel that when the men in charge of this work, men like Gen. Goethals, come before the committee and say it is of the utmost importance that——

Mr. SMOOT. He changed his opinion.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes; he changed his opinion; that is true; but he came back to ask us not to change the provision, and said that it was of the utmost importance that this language should stand and not be amended as suggested by the Senator from Utah. I think it would be a very unfortunate thing if the Senate to-night should change this language under those circumstances.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I am in hearty accord with the other members of the Committee on Appropriations as to all of this bill except the item to which reference has been made; and in that respect I am heartily in favor of the amendment offered by the Senator from Utah. It seems to me to be rather strange, when we have testimony to the effect that we can build new steel ships for $153 a ton, that it is proposed to take over ships at a cost of from $170 to $200 a ton, together with the additional cost of a certain amount, probably $10 a ton, for expediting their completion. I know that we would not do that in our own private affairs; we would not think of doing it in a business matter; and I can not see why we should spend the money of the Government in any other way than we would if we were spending it on our own account.

Mr. President, it has been said here that it is necessary to get these ships quickly. Why, we have given authority in this bill to expedite their construction and to pay the money for so expediting them. That would be much cheaper and better than to buy all the ships and own the title to them. It would require a comparatively small amount to expedite their construction, which the Senator from Utah has estimated at about $10 a ton.

Mr. President, I have been in favor of authorizing a large loan and of appropriating without stint the large amount of money that we are expending; but I do not believe in mixing up our affairs in relation to individual ships with any Government. If we extend a favor particularly to one of the allied Governments, there will be a desire upon the part of the others to have a similar favor extended to them. We do not want rivalries among our allies; we do not want to hear stated that we have done more for one than we have for the others. It seems to me that when we are taking this action on behalf of one Government and attempting to grant a special favor, as it might be termed, to one, it is not in the interest of harmony among the allies.

It is said by some that these ships will be remunerative; that they will enjoy a large trade at high rates, and that a ship will pay for itself in three trips, and in one instance it was said that it might even pay for itself in a single trip. That can not be the case when owned by our Government. The Government of the United States, if it takes over these ships and charters them, is evidently going to have a clause in the charter contract that there shall be charged no greater freight rate than a certain amount, and that rate is going to be a reasonable one. If we do not do that, we will be piling up on our allies the price of wheat, and the Congress of the United States will never stand for that. We want these ships for the purpose of getting foodstuffs over there at as low a price as possible, and if we operate these ships ourselves, as we have the power to do, we are going to charge a reasonable rate. We are not going to charge a rate that will pay for the ship in three trips or one trip, and if we charter them we are going to put a clause in the contract providing that a greater freight rate than a certain amount shall not be charged.

Under those circumstances, what becomes of the argument that there is a profit in buying these ships at $170 to $200 a ton? We might as well look a little further and see what is going to be the ultimate result of this policy. This war is not going to last forever; these ships must go into the merchant marine, and if we take them or buy them at from $170 to $200 a ton and put them into our merchant marine, they can not compete with ships constructed by other countries at from $45 to $50 a ton, which is the price is normal times. Thus it is going to put a permanent disadvantage upon our merchant marine, or else it will be necessary to wipe off the slate the investment we make in regard to these ships. It seems to me from all standpoints, and particularly from a business standpoint, that there is but one side to this question.

Now, as to expediting the construction of ships, these ships can be expedited; yes; and it does not take any commandering to do it. Men make contracts as to working three shifts a day. I think nearly every paying mine in my State is worked under a three-shift policy. You can easily make a contract for one shift, for two shifts, or for three shifts. It is purely a question of paying a little more money, and the amount of extra money that is paid is not very great. I do not think that the men who work in the night shifts in the mines get any more than the men who work in the day shifts; it is readily done by contract. It does not take the strong arm of the Government to go down there and say that "you are compelled to do this." It is a mere matter of contract between the person that owns the ship and the contractor who is building it; and for a small amount of money I have no doubt the three-shift proposition could be proposed and accepted by all.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I do.

Mr. HARDWICK. I just want to make this suggestion to the Senator: I think what he has just said is true; but still, suppose they could not get the material readily and promptly; suppose railroad facilities were lacking, and so on; suppose they could not get the material itself promptly when they needed it; could you commandeer that for a foreign ship?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I do not know as to a foreign ship, but I have not any doubt but that under the ordinary line of contracts it could be done. I do not believe that whether the ship is finished day after to-morrow or to-day is going to make such a terrible amount of difference; and there is no evidence as to the suggested tie-up, as it may be termed. These ships are being constructed now; and when it is proposed that because we want to expedite them somewhat we shall take them out of the hands of the British Government, even with their consent, at this price, it does not seem to me that it bears the impress of a business transaction.

I believe in this loan which we have made to the British Government, but I do not believe in going into an arrangement for giving them an advantage on the ship proposition which might create a jealousy with some other allied country because it did not get a similar benefit. If these ships were intended to go into the war against us, it would be a different proposition, but when they are to go into the same service of carrying food to our allies, the construction by us of a like number of new ships instead of buying the ships being constructed simply doubles the number of ships for our common cause.

For these reasons we should have this matter determined upon business principles, and business principles, it seems to me, require that the amendment offered by the Senator from Utah should be adopted, limiting this power to buy and commandeer ships to those of individuals, companies, and corporations, and not to the ships of other Governments.

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. President, I am exceedingly anxious to get a vote on this amendment before we adjourn, if it is possible, and yet I feel that I ought to say a few words. I do not think I will occupy five minutes.

The Senator from Colorado [Mr. SHAFROTH] talks about dealing with this as a business question. The great business question that is before us, Mr. President, is to maintain the honor of our country and protect the lives of our soldiers. It may cost a good deal of money to do that; but what are a few dollars as compared with the honor of the flag and the lives of the soldiers that we probably shall have to send to the line of battle in France?

A Senator remarked to me to-day, as he passed my seat, "They have commandeered my son. It seems to me they ought not to hesitate to commandeer the ships that they need." If you can commandeer the lives and the fortunes of the people of this country, do not stop at a few ships when the President, the Commander in Chief of your Army and your Navy, tells you that this provision is of vital importance. Gen. Goethals, one of the ablest and best and most patriotic men in our country, appealed to this committee, and said, "Give me this power." He said, "I want the power to take over these foreign ships that are under contract in our yards." He said, "I will not take over those that are nearly completed, but there are many ships there that will not be delivered for 18 months. I want the ways on which they are being constructed to construct more ships for the use of the American Republic." He appealed to the committee to give him those ways, and said, "It is true that we may speed them up without taking them over; but if we have got to pay, as we will have to do, to expedite their completion, we ought to expedite their completion as American ships and not as English ships."

Mr. President, suppose there should be a scarcity of food with the armies in France, and Great Britain has these ships and takes over food by which the men will be saved from famine, do you suppose that the British authorities will distribute those foodstuffs to the American soldiers when British soldiers are crying for bread? I do not attribute to them any unworthy motive; but I say, let us meet our own responsibilities and let us prepare to feed our own soldiers, and to carry ammunition to our own soldiers, so that they, well-fed and well-clothed, may fight as American soldiers are expected to fight.

I have the profoundest conviction that there is a great responsibility on us to provide for the utmost contingencies that may happen on the line of battle in France. Our duty is to make ready for the greatest difficulties that may arise. We are not in any child's play. We are in a terrible struggle with the German and the Austrian Armies in Europe, and we ought to prepare to meet those responsibilities, and we ought to have the ships to transport the food and the munitions to take care of our Army.

I think we ought to send a division abroad as quickly as possible for the moral effect of it; I want to see the Stars and Stripes on the line of battle; but I hope it will not be necessary for us to send any large army to France. But nobody can see into the future sufficiently to say that we will not have to do it; and I say that the responsibility confronts the American Senate to-day to prepare for the worst that may happen. We may have to send a large army to France. We must prepare to convey to them food and clothes and munitions, everything that they will need, for we can not expect our allies to do those things.

I do not think it proper for me to repeat some things that have been said to me, but it can easily be reasoned out that our allies have their hands full. Great Britain has had to construct 5,000 miles of railroad in France in order to carry from the port of entry the supplies needed for her own army. We will have to provision and equip and arm and supply the army that we send over there, and the responsibility is on the American Senate to-night to make provision that will enable us to meet that responsibility.

The President of the United States said many things that I do not think I ought to repeat on the floor of the Senate; but quite a number of Senators were present besides myself, and they know that he emphasized the fact that, in his judgment, it was of the utmost importance for us to provide ships; as the Senator from Georgia said, ships, and ships, and more ships. The vital turning point in this contest is the transportation of men and supplies from this country to the line of battle in France.

I trust that the Senate will vote down the amendment that is offered by the Senator from Utah, the object of which is to take away from Gen. Goethals the discretion which the bill, as reported, gives him to take over these ships if he thinks it well to do so. He says he will not take over those that are nearly completed, but those that have a long-distant date for delivery he wants to take over, because he wants the ways. He not only wants these ships quickly constructed by expediting their construction so that we may have the use of them, but he wants to put more ships on those ways. I appeal to the Senate to give him the power that he asks, and to give him the power which the President of the United States, who is the Commander in Chief of our Army and our Navy, says is of vital importance to the successful conduct of this war on the part of the United States.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, I shall take only a moment of the Senate's time.

We are here making an appropriation of $750,000,000. We are proposing to give the President the right to commandeer the shipyards of this country and the ships being built by private individuals, and I can not see why we should hamper this program by excluding the ships contracted for by Great Britain. If we are going to make any such appropriation as that—and we are going to do it—and grant these powers, it seems to me we had better not hamper the administration with any restrictions as to what ships, of what governments, we shall take over.

Furthermore, while I appreciate very much what the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] has said—that as a business proposition it does not seem wise to purchase now, at a cost of $153 per ton, ships which perhaps may be built for very much less after the war—yet I have no assurance that as soon as the war is over we can build them for very much less, at least for a while; and, furthermore, I do not believe that the amount of our expenditure over the normal price will be an entire loss. If private individuals can now build ships that are costing $180 and $200 a ton and make money upon them, I do not know of any reason why, if we are going into the shipbuilding business, the Government can not also do it.

But beyond that I believe that the greatest opportunity this country ever has had or ever will have to build up its foreign commerce will be at the close of this war. I believed that when the war broke out—and said so many times, especially when I came home from Europe after the war broke out—that as much as we should deplore this great world catastrophe it furnished for this country an opportunity to build up a foreign commerce such as we never have had before and never will have again. With German commerce destroyed, with the commerce of other countries largely limited by lack of ships, I believe that it is of the greatest importance that when this war closes we shall have in our control, and not in the control of Great Britain or any other country, the largest number of ships we can possibly have.

Why, have we not seen within the last year England and France making an agreement in Paris that British ships and French ships should be used to further British commerce and French commerce after the war? If we are going to make any such enormous appropriation, I do not see why we should except from the ships that may be taken the British ships or any other government ships, and take simply those belonging to private individuals or corporations.

I assume, of course, that the men in control of this affair will not precipitate any trouble between this Government and the British Government or any neutral government, and that they will not take over all of these ships; but we must trust the power somewhere, and I do not see any reason why we should make an exception of foreign governments.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President, I do not intend to delay the Senate, but as a matter of information I am in position to communicate a fact.

I learned to-day, and have already made representations to the State Department on the subject, that on May 15 the British Government instructed its brokers not to allow the transfer of neutral ships or charter parties to any ownership but British ownership. An American firm had entered into negotiations a week ago. The terms were satisfactory. The neutral owners desired to sell. The negotiations having been delayed for an unreasonable time, the American merchant inquired by cable and learned that on May 15 the British Government had forbidden the transfer of neutral ships or charter parties to American owners. Therefore, when we discuss the matter of merchant marine, we see that these great commercial nations, even in the midst of war——

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. PHELAN. I do.

Mr. GALLINGER. Do we at this distance correctly understand the Senator to say that the British Government assumes the right to deny the neutral governments of the world the right to dispose of their ships to the United States? Is it possible?

Mr. PHELAN. I do not know that my statement was exactly in those terms, but the way it came to me—and it is tantamount to the same thing—is that the British Government had forbidden its brokers to negotiate for the sale and transfer of neutral ships to any other than British owners.

Mr. GALLINGER. That seems to be a mighty unfriendly act on the part of a government that is borrowing money from us to feed its people and fight its battles.

Mr. PHELAN. It came to me from very reliable sources, and I thought it would be interesting to the Senate.

Mr. GALLINGER. It is interesting, but it is absurd.

Mr. PHELAN. Well, I wish to make this point: We are providing money——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, will the Senator state it once more? We have disagreed about what he said. I understood him to say that the British Government declined to recognize the transfer of vessels by neutral nations, or nationals of neutral nations, to any but British citizens.

Mr. PHELAN. It forbade its brokers to negotiate for the sale and transfer of neutral ships or charter parties to any other than British owners; and the American merchant whose case I have in mind therefore is denied the privilege of acquiring a neutral ship or charter parties to enlarge our merchant marine.

Now, we are supplying these foreign Governments with money. Are we supplying them with money to purchase ships necessary for the purpose or supplying their populations with food, but also with the ultimate view of maintaining their foreign commerce as against American interests?

As the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG] has said, this is a great oportunity for the United States, in a perfectly friendly way, to provide for the ultimate supremacy of the merchant marine of this country by giving into the hands of the Government at this time ships which are upon the ways, and instead of providing money for foreigners to acquire these ships, I assume that that money in part will be used to put us in a position, if necessary in the judgment of the President and the Shipping Board, to acquire those ships for ourselves.

Having in view not only the exigency of the moment but ultimately the supremacy of our ships upon the seas, I think it is a matter of great importance that we should adopt the committee's recommendation, which is also the recommendation of the President.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, at the opening of this discussion I was very much inclined to vote against the report of the committee, but I have determined to vote for it, and I wish in just a word to say why. It is not because I am convinced that it is a good business transaction. I do not see the profit claimed and I do not see from a business standpoint the advantage of paying the higher price for vessels contracted for by Great Britain. Nor do I see the advantage of our owning vessels rather than letting Great Britain own them. I would prefer they should be English vessels if they are to go through the war zone carrying to England food and munitions.

I do not believe that it is practical for insurance to carry the entire risk and to bring complete remuneration for the loss, because I do not think it possible, certainly not as to munitions, to transfer to the owner of the munitions the risk of the loss. If we have troops over in France, it will be our own munitions and it will be our own burden that we are transferring to ourselves.

I am not impressed with the idea that we should hurry up the construction of these English vessels and get them before we can build vessels of our own to feed our own troops in France. I am utterly opposed to sending these untrained boys of ours whom we are conscripting to France within the next 12 months. I think to take them there untrained would be criminal, and I do not believe that any man will dare try to take them there for at least 12 months. There may be volunteers who will wish to go at once. There may be men already with the Army who are trained soldiers who will be ready to go.

I do not vote for the committee report upon the theory that we need these vessels within the next month to feed our own troops in France, but I do believe that we can not commandeer shipyards or men to hasten the completion of ships for the English Government. If it is necessary to have these English vessels for immediate use I am willing to speed their completion even if the power of our Government to commandeer plants and men is used.

I want our Nation to do all that is required to aid our allies with food and munitions and upon the ocean all that can be done with ships. I think our allies ought to do the fighting, for the present at least, in France.

It is because I am glad to help them get food and get it promptly I vote if necessary to commandeer the shipyards to complete these vessels faster than England can complete them. I would vote for the United States to spend more money to furnish food and munitions to our allies, and not with the view of sending our own men over there at once and using these vessels to feed them.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Utah to the amendment.

Mr. SMOOT. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CURTIS (when the name of Mr. JONES of Washington was called). I was requested to announce the unavoidable absence of the Senator from Washington. Were he present, he would vote "nay."

The PRESIDING OFFICER (when Mr. ROBINSON'S name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] and vote "nay."

Mr. STERLING (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. THOMAS (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] to the Senator from Arizona [Mr. SMITH] and vote "nay."

Mr. SMITH of Michigan (when Mr. TOWNSEND'S name was called). My colleague [Mr. TOWNSEND] is absent and is paired.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The present occupant of the chair will state to the Senator from Michigan that he has a pair with the Senator's colleague, and he announced its transfer to the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN].

Mr. UNDERWOOD (when his name was called). I transfer my general pair with the junior Senator from Ohio [Mr. HARDING] to the senior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. HUGHES] and vote "nay."

Mr. CALDER (when Mr. WADSWORTH'S name was called). My colleague [Mr. WADSWORTH] is detained from the Chamber on important business.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. KELLOGG (after having voted in the negative). I did not announce my pair when I voted. I was informed that the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS], with whom I have a general pair, would vote "nay" if present, and so I was at liberty to vote.

Mr. KENYON. I desire to announce the absence of my colleague [Mr. CUMMINS]. He is paired with the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK].

Mr. SMITH of Georgia (after having voted in the negative). The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] has not voted. I do not know how he would vote if present. I transfer my pair with that Senator to the junior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. HUSTING] and let my vote stand.

Mr. GERRY. I have been requested to announce that the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. VARDAMAN] is detained on official business.

Mr. CURTIS. I have been requested to announce the following pairs:

The Senator from Idaho [Mr. BRADY] with the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. VARDAMAN];

The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] with the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS];

The Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN];

So Mr. SMOOT'S amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. NORRIS. On page 3, line 17, after "boat," I move to strike out the word "or" between the words "boat" and "vessel" and to insert after "vessel" the words "or submarine," so that the sentence will read:

The word "ship" shall include any boat, vessel, or submarine and the parts thereof.

Mr. MARTIN. I agree to the amendment to the amendment. I think it is a very proper one and ought to be adopted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WEEKS. I offer an amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be read.

The SECRETARY. After the word "President," in line 22, page 5, add the following proviso:

Provided, That the reasonable prices referred to in this paragraph shall not be less than cost plus 8 per cent profit.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, at different places in the bill in recurring to the general subject the terms "reasonable price" and "reasonable compensation" are used. It seems to me that it would be both fair and reasonable that that should be limited to cost plus 8 per cent profit.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Does the Senator mean less than or more than?

Mr. WEEKS. Shall not be less than cost plus 8 per cent profit.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do not think we ought to adopt an amendment of that kind to the bill.

Mr. THOMAS. I should like to ask the Senator from Massachusetts whether he means the cost of construction or the cost to the owner?

Mr. WEEKS. I mean the cost to the owner. In line 22, on page 6, this expression is used in the committee's bill:

Plus a reasonable profit to be determined by him.

I think a reasonable profit should mean at least cost plus 8 per cent profit.

Mr. KNOX. What about depreciation?

Mr. WEEKS. I assume all those things will be taken into consideration.

Mr. KNOX. The original cost may be specifically determined. A vessel may be 10, 12, or 20 years old and not be worth anything like its original cost.

Mr. WEEKS. The President might conclude in some cases that it would be desirable to give a great deal more than cost plus 8 per cent.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do.

Mr. CALDER. I hope this amendment to the amendment will not prevail. There is a revenue bill under consideration in the other House, where they are discussing an increase of the corporation tax and where they may lower the excess profits tax. There are so many matters involved in this question that I am sure we can trust the Shipping Board or the President to fix regulations that will not give an excessive profit to the corporations that will build these ships. As they are to be built largely by corporations, it seems to me that it would be exceedingly dangerous to adopt the amendment to the amendment, in view of the facts pertaining to the case.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, I think the amendment ought not to be agreed to for this reason: The Senator from Massachusetts seeks to fix a minimum price that we shall pay for these ships when we take them over, to wit, the cost and 8 per cent profit. That may or may not be a reasonable price. As the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX] suggested a moment ago, it leaves out of the equation entirely the question of depreciation. It may leave out of the equation a great many other things that should be considered.

The committee's bill is perfectly fair as it is written. It provides that any ship that is commandeered or any shipyard or anything else that is commandeered shall be paid for at a reasonable price to be agreed on between the President or those acting for him and the owner. If they can agree on a reasonable price, that is the end of it; but if they can not agree on a reasonable price, what is the result? The President is to pay the owner 75 per cent of what the President thinks is a reasonable price, and then the owner can go into court and sue for whatever he wants, and the court, with all the facts before it, will ascertain what is a reasonable price and give it to him.

I do not think we ought to go beyond that equation. I think that is fair; it is just. We are doing more for the owner than we do in an ordinary lawsuit, because we are going to pay him 75 per cent of what we think is reasonable in advance, and then we leave it to the court to determine what is a reasonable price. The court will have an opportunity in each case to judge of the equation and adjust its decision to the particular case in hand.

Mr. NELSON. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Certainly.

Mr. NELSON. I think the Senator is correct, except to this extent, that we must comply with the Constitution and give just compensation, to be determined by the court.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Surely.

Mr. NELSON. They can not claim any more. We owe that which is just compensation within the language of the Constitution.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. That is what this bill provides for, and I think that is as far as we should go.

Mr. WEEKS. I wish the Senator to remember that we are commandeering property.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Undoubtedly.

Mr. WEEKS. And there should be some reasonable profit when property is commandeered for Government purposes.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I have no doubt the court will take the value of the ship at the time it commandeers it. Both these ships are at a profit now and whatever is the just value, even if there is profit, is added to the cost. We are not limited to the cost. One man may have made more than 8 per cent. He may have bought his ship at a time when it was very cheap, and he may have a profit of 200 per cent. Another may have bought his ship 30 days ago and may not have 8 per cent profit in it. Why should we in adopting a hard-and-fast rule of this kind say that the profit shall not be less than 8 per cent? To say that the court shall take that as an equation and nobody shall get more than 8 per cent, I think would be a very unsafe thing to do.

Mr. NELSON. Will the Senator yield for a further interruption?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I yield.

Mr. NELSON. By taking this property we are taking property for a public use, and all that we owe the owners under the Constitution is just compensation.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Surely, and that is what this bill provides for.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I yield the floor, unless the Senator wishes to ask a question.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. If the Senator has finished, I wish to call attention to the way the amendment suggested by the Senator from Massachusetts would read in connection with the paragraph. Paragraph (c), on page 5, refers not only to the shipyard, called in the bill the factory, but to all the materials, and under the definition contained in the bill the word "material" is defined to be all "stores, supplies, and equipment for ships, and everything required for or in connection with the construction thereof." It might be a somewhat complicated matter to determine what the rightful cost of all the supplies that are to be used on these ships during the period of the war might be, and it might well be that 8 per cent on some of the materials and equipment might be more than even the owner of them would demand in the way of profit on his investment. It might be that 5 per cent would be enough; and I should think it would be of doubtful propriety to fix an arbitrary sum that the President should not go under in the purchase.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President, no American citizen that I have ever heard of has ever suffered where power has been given to the Government—to the President or to any other official of the Government—to take private property for public use where the right to fix the compensation has been vested in the Government; and it is not an unusual power.

The Senate will recall that when the Government of the United States granted to the telegraph companies the right to construct their lines across the public domain to the Pacific coast many years ago the power was vested in the Postmaster General to fix the rate that the Government should pay for the transmission of its messages, and I can only recall one instance where there was any complaint that the Government sought to exercise that power arbitrarily. When the concession was given to the Pacific Cable Co. to construct a line to Manila, and thence to the continent of Asia, I recall—because I drew the contract between the concessionaires and the Government—that we insisted that in that concession or privilege there should be inserted a provision that the cable rates for the Government messages should be fixed by the Postmaster General. They have been fixed from that time on, and there has never, so far as I know, been any complaint.

All the requirements of the Constitution are met, as suggested by the senior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON], when we provide for just compensation; and if the President has the power, which we propose to give him in this bill, to tender a reasonable price, and it is accepted by the owner of the ship, that is an admission and an agreement that the price which the President tenders is just compensation within the provisions of the Constitution.

I think, Mr. President, that, with the right of appeal, if the President and the owner of the ship can not agree on what is just compensation, all the provision is made that is necessary, or all that is practicable.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Texas offers an amendment, which the Secretary will state.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to amend, by inserting between the word "outfits" and the word "to," on page 38, line 19, the following——

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, I am informed that the committee amendments have not been disposed of.

Mr. MARTIN. The unanimous-consent agreement was that the committee amendments should first be considered.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Very well. I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I will ask the Senator from Virginia if he purposes trying to get this bill through tonight?

Mr. MARTIN. I am exceedingly anxious to get behind us the provision regarding the Shipping Board. I thought we were at the end of that portion of the bill, and I still think we are so near the end of it that I should like to have the Senate remain and finish it.

Mr. GALLINGER. I had intended to address the Senate at some length on that provision, but I can forego doing so and speak on some other subject, if I conclude to do so.

Mr. MARTIN. I thank the Senator, because I am exceedingly anxious to make some headway with this bill.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I present a telegram from Mr. G. O. Guy, of Seattle, Wash., a druggist, on behalf of himself and other druggists, asking that Schedule B of the Spanish-American War stamp tax be not reenacted unless it is provided that the tax shall go on to the consumer, which I ask to have referred to the Committee on Finance.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, that action will be taken.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I present a telegram from E. F. Benson, commissioner of agriculture and chairman of the advisory committee of the State of Washington, urging that an emergency appropriation be made for agricultural agents throughout the State. I move that the telegram be referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. PHELAN presented a memorial of the Labor Council of San Francisco, Cal, remonstrating against national prohibition, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Genter and 51 other citizens of Providence and Cranston; of Rev. Alexander Cole and 23 other citizens of Providence; of Edward O. Briggs and 42 other citizens of Newport; of Rev. William I. Ward, D. D., and 22 other citizens of Newport; of the State Street Methodist Episcopal Church, of Bristol; and of Union Grange, Patrons of Husbandry, of North Smithfield, all in the State of Rhode Island, praying for national prohibitory legislation as a war and food conservation measure, which were referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. PAGE presented the memorial of W. H. Parker and sundry other citizens of Cambridge, Vt., remonstrating against the use of grain in the manufacture of intoxicating liquors, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. GALLINGER presented a petition of the New Hampshire Federation of Women's Clubs, praying that a 5-mile prohibition zone be established around military camps, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also presented a petition of the Board of Trade of Concord, N. H., praying for the use by the United States as a military camp of the State camp grounds in that city; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. HALE. I present resolutions of the United Brotherhood of Carpenters, Local Union No. 348, of Waterville, Me., which I ask to have inserted in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the resolutions were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

UNITED BROTHERHOOD OF CARPENTERS, LOCAL 348,
Waterville, Me., May 11, 1917.

Whereas the United States is at war with Germany; and

Whereas immense war appropriations must be made immediately to supply the Government with funds necessary to carry on the war; and

Whereas it is of paramount importance in this crisis that the financial burden of the war should be distributed among the citizens of the United States in accordance with their ability to bear it; and

Whereas in the interest of national unity and a spirit of harmonious cooperation between all classes, it is necessary that every citizen should know that the cost of the war will be paid promptly, and not remain as a future burden upon those who fought and their children: Therefore be it

Resolved, That all bonds, certificates of indebtedness, and other obligations issued by the Government for war purposes shall be paid by a tax to be levied on all net incomes in excess of $2,000 (for unmarried persons) and in excess of $3,000 (for married persons), beginning at 2 per cent and increasing on a sliding scale to a point which will permit of no individual retaining an annual net income in excess of $100,000, such war tax to continue until said bonds, certificates of indebtedness, and other obligations issued for war purposes are paid; and be it further

Resolved, That all war supplies or war service, including transportation, shall be furnished to the Government at a reasonable profit, to be fixed by Congress; that Congress shall enact legislation preventing the sale of necessaries of life during the war at excessive profits; and that intentional failure to supply the Government with correct figures as to income or as to profits on such sales and service and that furnishing the Government with defective war supplies shall be a felony, punishable by imprisonment.

[SEAL.] C. P. SMITH, President.
M. E. HUNT, Secretary.

Mr. HALE presented a petition of the Rotary Club, of Portland, Me., praying for the adoption of the daylight-saving plan, which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

INCREASE OF NAVY AND MARINE CORPS.

Mr. SWANSON. I submit the conference report on the bill (H. R. 3330) to increase the Navy and Marine Corps, which I desire to have printed in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The conference report will be received and ordered printed in the RECORD.

The conference report is as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 3330) to temporarily increase the commissioned and warrant and enlisted strength of the Navy and Marine Corps, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 4, 5, and 21.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1, 2, 3, 6, 7, 8, 10, 11, 12, 14, 15, 16, 18, and 20, and agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 9, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Page 2, in line 10, of the engrossed amendment, strike out the semicolon after the word "prescribe" and in lieu thereof insert the following: "to fill vacancies in the several grades as provided by existing law"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 13, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter stricken out and the new matter inserted, insert the following:

"That commencing June 1, 1917, and continuing until not later than six months after the termination of the present war, all enlisted men of the Navy of the United States in active service whose base pay does not exceed $21 per month shall receive an increase of $15 per month; those whose base pay is over $21 and does not exceed $24 per month, an increase of $12 per month; those whose base pay is over $24 and less than $45 per month, an increase of $8 per month; and those whose base pay is $45 or more per month, an increase of $6 per month: Provided, That the increases of pay herein authorized shall not enter into the computation of continuous-service pay."

And the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 17, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Page 7, line 9 of said engrossed amendment, after the word "that" insert the words "in time of war"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 19, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: At the end of said amendment strike out the period, insert a colon, and add the following proviso: "Provided further, That the President be, and he is hereby, authorized to direct the Secretary of the Navy to take such action on the records of proceedings of naval examining boards and boards of naval surgeons for the promotion of officers of the Navy as is now required by law to be taken by the President"; and the Senate agree to the same.

ARMY AND NAVY APPROPRIATIONS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 3971) making appropriations to supply urgent deficiencies in appropriations for the Military and Naval Establishments on account of war expenses for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917, and for other purposes.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I am constrained to offer an amendment which I have prepared, and which I had printed and called attention to several days ago, which must be connected with the pending committee amendment or it could not be submitted at all.

The PRESIDING OFFICER [Mr. ROBINSON in the chair]. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 7, after line 15, it is proposed to insert:

The President is hereby authorized to expend $100,000,000, out of the sums hereinbefore appropriated for ships, for the construction or acquirement of freight cars, to be used in transportation by the railroad companies of the United States; and in the execution of this authority for the acquirement and construction of said cars he may exercise all the powers hereinbefore given to him with reference to ships. The President may direct the general manager of the United States Shipping Board Emergency Fleet Corps to exercise the power hereby vested in him or he may designate such other person or persons as he sees fit to exercise said power and authority subject to his approval, and the cars shall be used by the railroad companies under such terms and for such compensation as may be approved by the President, and as far as possible under agreements providing for the purchase of such cars by the railroad companies receiving them.

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. President, I make the point of order that the amendment is in violation of the unanimous-consent agreement, which provided that committee amendments should be first considered and disposed of.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. But, Mr. President, this is an amendment to a committee amendment.

Mr. MARTIN. If the Senator can work out that in his mind, he has a bigger mind than I have taken him to have.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It is the only way in which it can be presented.

Mr. MARTIN. That may be true——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The committee amendment deals with the subject of transportation. When the Senator is through, I will continue——

Mr. MARTIN. The Senator, of course, can occupy as much time as he pleases. I am not interfering with that.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The committee amendment deals with the problem of transportation.

Mr. MARTIN. If the Senator will excuse me, I have raised a point of order against this amendment, and that question is not debatable.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I am calling the attention of the Chair to the situation so far as this amendment is concerned.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is hearing the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. MARTIN. Still the point of order is not debatable. That is the rule of the Senate, and I ask for its enforcement.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. That is in the discretion of the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is ready to rule. The Chair thinks that in the form the Senator from Georgia has offered his amendment it is in order.

Mr. MARTIN. That is all right. That disposes of it and gives the Senator the right to go on.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I desire to address the Senate upon it.

Mr. JAMES. Let us vote.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. No; I do not wish to vote now. I wish to discuss the amendment, and I prefer to do so to-morrow morning.

Mr. MARTIN. I hope the Senate will remain and let us finish this portion of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Georgia has been recognized.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, while I regret to detain the Senate at this late hour, yet, as the Senator from Virginia prefers that the Senate remain in session, I am constrained to do so. I shall wait a few moments until those who intend to leave have left. I have ample time myself and do not object to waiting.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I am quite certain that the bill will not be expedited by trying to hold the Senate here to-night.

Mr. MARTIN. I am sure we can not finish the bill; but I thought that as the Senator from Georgia was very anxious to be heard that some of us would stay here and hear him. I shall be glad to do so.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I am quite certain that Members on this side are not going to stay here much longer to-night; and if the Senator would move an adjournment, the Senator from Georgia could make his speech in the morning.

Mr. MARTIN. I should like to see this part of the bill finished to-night so that we may take up something else in the morning.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I am not in so big a hurry as is the Senator from Virginia upon this subject, and I deem it important to present the amendment fully.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes.

Mr. PENROSE. I do not think the Senator from Virginia will expedite this measure by keeping us here. The Senator from Georgia probably will speak at considerable length, and I have just been informed of several other amendments which are about to be offered.

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. President, I move that the Senate adjourn until 10 o'clock to-morrow morning.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Virginia moves that the Senate adjourn until 10 o'clock to-morrow morning. The question is on that motion.

Mr. PENROSE. I hope the Senator will think twice about that, if he will permit me.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion is not debatable.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. It is amendable, and I desire to offer an amendment.

Mr. PENROSE. It is contrary to the understanding had with the chairman of the Finance Committee, which was that the Senate would not meet until 12 o'clock.

Mr. MARTIN. That was not mentioned to me, except as applying to to-day. The chairman of the Finance Committee asked me not to meet to-day until 12 o'clock.

Mr. PENROSE. The committee meets to-morrow at 9.30 a. m.

Mr. MARTIN. That committee can meet, and at the same time we can make some headway with this bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is not debatable. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Virginia that the Senate adjourn until 10 o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I move that the time be changed to 12 o'clock, as the Finance Committee will be in session in the morning.

Mr. PENROSE. I presume the chairman of the committee understands that that was the continuous understanding for the present at least.

Mr. MARTIN. No such suggestion was made to me. Those who made the understanding can carry it out. It has never even been suggested to me. I have never been asked to do it, nor has the suggestion been made to me in any shape whatever.

Mr. THOMAS. Question!

Mr. MARTIN. I modify my motion and move that the Senate take a recess until 10 o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I move to amend by substituting "12 o'clock" for "10 o'clock."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Georgia to the motion of the Senator from Virginia, that the Senate take a recess until 12 o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The motion was to adjourn.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The Senator from Virginia modified his motion.

Mr. MARTIN. My motion as modified was for a recess until 10 o'clock.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Georgia. [Putting the question.] The noes seem to have it.

Mr. PENROSE, Mr. BRANDEGEE, and Mr. SMITH of Georgia demanded a division.

On a division, the amendment of Mr. SMITH of Georgia was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on the motion of the Senator from Virginia as amended.

The motion as amended was agreed to; and (at 6 o'clock and 30 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until to-morrow, Saturday, May 19, 1917, at 12 o'clock m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, May 18, 1917.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Let Thy spirit, Almighty God our Heavenly Father, possess our minds and hearts, that we may think clearly, act wisely, do justly in the great preparation for the mighty struggle which looms before us. Unite us as a people and prepare us to meet the sacrifices with fortitude and courage. Grant that we may accumulate all the forces available, and help us to put behind them skill and energy; that we may prosecute the task with all diligence; that the agony may be of short duration; that victory may follow the right to the betterment of all mankind. For Thine is the kingdom and the power and the glory forever. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

CORRECTIONS.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, my attention is called to the fact that there is a misprint in the conference report of one word, and I ask for the present consideration of the following concurrent resolution.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a concurrent resolution, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

House concurrent resolution 8.

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That in the enrollment of the bill H. R. 3545, entitled "An act to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States," the Clerk be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to strike out the word "member" in the fifth line of the matter inserted by the committee of conference on said bill and amendment and to insert in lieu thereof the word "number."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of the resolution? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The resolution was agreed to.

WAR REVENUE.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 4280.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 4280, with Mr. FOSTER in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the bill by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 4280) to provide revenue to defray war expenses, and for other purposes.

The CHAIRMAN. When the House adjourned last evening there was a motion pending to strike out section 5, on which there was to be one hour's debate, one-half to be controlled by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] and one-half by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN]. The gentleman from Illinois is recognized.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS].

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, this provision of the bill, I think, ought to be stricken out if there is any possible way to do it. First, because I think it is unjust, and, secondly, I think it is unscientific. It is inequitable and unlike anything ever attempted by our Government. If adopted as a policy it is fraught with great possibilities for danger. It is not the amount of burden fixed by this section that I object to. I am ready to fix any rate of tax on incomes that seems necessary to meet this situation. But we open the door of unexpected dangers if we adopt this policy of taxation as a principle. I am not opposing the bill as a whole, because I think we are all convinced that some measure to secure the needed funds for the coming year must be passed and ought to be passed speedily. It will give confidence to the country.

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. Yes; I yield.

Mr. GARNER. The gentleman is agreed, then, that we should collect the amount of money proposed to be collected in this bill?

Mr. FESS. I believe that we ought to collect that amount of money if it is established that we need it, and when that point is reached I will vote for it, and I am frank to admit that I am somewhat concerned about it, and am rather persuaded, from the reports that have come from the Secretary of the Treasury, that we will need it. But I do not mean by that that every method that is proposed in this bill should be indorsed simply because we need the money.

Mr. GARNER. I agree with the gentleman. I would say to him that the members of the committee took the same view of this tax that he does. But the question is, when you strike out $110,000,000 from the bill, from what other place are you going to get it?

Mr. FESS. There are other ways to get it and ways that probably would be less burdensome and at the same time would be more equitable and would not violate the principles of taxation that no Member of the House here wants to violate.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. FESS. I will yield, but I do not want all of my time taken up.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Would the gentleman kindly suggest some other way of raising this amount of revenue?

Mr. FESS. The unscientific method of the writing of this bill is suggested by the various opinions that have been expressed by individual members of the committee, in which many ways have been suggested but not included in this proposal. The gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL] suggested a way by which we could raise a very large amount of money and one that would be satisfactory to me as a method. I need not here repeat it. I am sure most on this side of the Chamber will agree with him. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY] suggested a method by the laying of a stamp tax on checks, by which he said a thousand million dollars could be raised. That may be an excess sum, but all will agree that it would raise a very large sum. This suggestion as a plan in time of war, while it is inconvenient, is a method that has been employed by our Government in times of emergency, and by other governments, and we could easily employ it without surrendering the proper principles of taxation, as this section does surrender the proper principles of taxation.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. Yes; I yield.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Does the gentleman think he would get 25 votes in the House on that proposition?

Mr. FESS. Well, you will get my vote, and no doubt other votes will come in.

This method is unscientific. Note its workings. It is laying a burden to be paid out this year upon the receipts of last year, notwithstanding the fact that last year's receipts may have been invested in the furthering and developing of the business in which they would be employed, where they become a charge on the business rather than an income upon which to base a tax. There is no basis upon which you could lay a burden this year upon last year that would be scientific. It is unjust because it is inequitable, and it is certainly unscientific.

My friend said that they made up this bill and then compared the estimates of possible revenue with the estimates of needed revenue as made up by the Secretary of the Treasury, and found that we were $110,000,000 short. Now, where could we get it? Instead of rewriting this schedule on the income tax, you indorsed or adopted an unheard of thing by making it retroactive upon what was produced last year, to be levied this year—a thing unheard of that can not certainly be defended in this House.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. Certainly.

Mr. LONGWORTH. My colleague will also recall that the Secretary of the Treasury suggested a retroactive tax on the excess profit returns of 1916, which we did not put in.

Mr. FESS. I will say to my colleague from Ohio that I would increase the excess profit tax this year if necessary, but I would not increase it on the basis of the profits of last year.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Neither did we.

Mr. FESS. And, further, I would impose the excess profits tax not upon the profits of general business but the special business that is making additional money out of the war. [Applause.] That is what England has done, lifting the profits tax from 60 per cent to 80 per cent. [Applause.]

I wish again to say that I do not oppose this section because of the amount of money imposed on incomes. Our income-tax rates are far lower than those of England, where the exemption is $650, and the rates from 7½ to 12½ per cent on the lowest amounts. It reaches 42½ per cent when the income reaches $50,000. Last year England, with a population half of ours and a wealth not more than one-half, paid an income tax of $1,020,000,000. I am ready to increase the rates if it appears necessary, but I can not adopt a retroactive principle of taxation because of the untold dangers involved should we adopt it here, and if by our act becomes a precedent for future action no one can indicate what we may be called upon to do before we get through with this and other proposals. I shall vote to strike out this section.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DYER].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, this is one of the most objectionable parts of this bill. It is not only an additional tax upon industry and thrift, which can not be justified even in this emergency, and it puts corporations, associations, and individual business men to the greatest possible inconvenience and expense.

Some gentlemen have suggested that the stamp tax would cause inconvenience, but that would be a tax upon a great portion of the people of this country. It would affect some people in some States who are not now paying practically any tax, and who under this law will not pay any. Some States in this Union, under the present bill, will not pay a very considerable portion of this tax. It is a tax, Mr. Chairman, upon the successful industries of our country. It is a tax upon business success. The district that I have the honor to represent in this House will pay more tax under this bill than some two of the States in this Union.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Missouri yield to the gentleman from Arkansas?

Mr. DYER. Yes.

Mr. CARAWAY. Do you think that is due to the superior intelligence and enterprise of your people, or to the fact that the people of other States do more business with the people of your district? Which is it?

Mr. DYER. Well, my colleague from the great State of Arkansas would be facetious about his question; but, Mr. Chairman——

Mr. CARAWAY. I am not facetious about it. If you have an answer to it, I would like to have it.

Mr. DYER. This method of taxation would affect the vital success of our country. We want this tax, if possible, to be divided amongst our people. The direct tax is never equitable; it is never fair; it is never just to the people, because a portion of the people pay the tax and a good portion of the people do not pay any. Why not put a tax upon some other things, as suggested by the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL]? Why not tax sugar? Would it not be an equitable tax? The amount paid by each person throughout the country would be necessarily small, but it would bring in immeasurable revenue to the Government.

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DYER. Yes.

Mr. GORDON. I wanted to ask you about that tax on sugar. For every dollar of tax on sugar that goes into the Treasury the consumer is taxed $2.20; that is, for every 40 cents of tax received by the Government the consumer pays a dollar. Is not that true?

Mr. DYER. No; it is not true. [Laughter.]

Mr. GORDON. It is true.

Mr. DYER. The proposition is that we ought to equalize the tax. This retroactive feature of this bill is a vicious and wrong proposition. It is bound to do great harm to the industries that are now prospering. It is bound to injure them and bound to wrong the great cities that are now paying the greater portion of the tax under the income tax and that will pay under this.

They say the city should pay the tax because of the prosperity that comes to it comes from the people of the country. But the people of the country are as prosperous to-day and even more prosperous than the people of the cities. The farmers are more prosperous than the people of the cities on the general average. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I include in my remarks the views of several of the most substantial business men of my city upon this phase of the bill. They are as follows:

INTERNATIONAL SHOE CO.,
St. Louis, Mo., May 11, 1917.

Hon. L. C. DYER,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. DYER: I am in receipt of yours inclosing copy of bill introduced by the Ways and Means Committee, said bill being for the purpose of providing revenues to pay war expenses and for other purposes. You have asked my opinion on it, and I shall try, briefly, to give it to you.

In the first place, I feel that the measure is a colossal blunder on the part of the Government. I can not characterize it otherwise. While no man ever calculated other than that the burden of taxation of this war would fall largely on the business and wealth of the country—and I might say properly so, when equitably distributed in proportion to the wealth and productive capacity of the country—to undertake to so revolutionize the taxing powers of this country as is done by this bill, will so thoroughly demoralize the business of this country that I am willing to go on record as saying that the excess income calculated under this bill is going to be very disappointing.

When you have destroyed the incentive to make money you have created the greatest obstacle against progress and the development of this country it is possible to create, and I can see at this time in every direction the baleful influence of the proposed legislation. I do not question that the effect of this bill will be such as to demoralize trade to an extent that a great many of the surplus incomes will become deficits, and no means provided in this bill to meet the deficits.

The enormous increase in prices of all commodities necessitates every large company's increasing its capital, or otherwise increasing its borrowing powers to an extent which will enable it to take care of the increased cost of doing business and the increased cost of materials used in manufacturing, and if the power to produce money to take care of this increase is destroyed, then the credit of the corporation will be materially weakened on account of the conditions which will be produced under the proposed measure.

It would have proven no burden to this country, even if $10,000,000,000 of bonds were necessary to be floated at the rate of as much as 4 per cent. The additional burden of interest, together with a sufficient sinking fund to retire these bonds within a period of 30 years, could have been met under a reasonable increase in taxation without demoralizing the financial structure of this country. Due to this measure, in my opinion, the Government is going to find it very hard to float the large issue of bonds at the low rate at which they are offered. You can not take all the money of the country by extraordinary taxation, such as is provided for in this measure, and leave to the people any money to invest in bonds.

The more I have studied this measure, the more thoroughly I have been convinced that it is ill-advised legislation and in the end will prove destructive to the commercial interests, and when you destroy the commercial interests you must necessarily reflect on the farming as well as all other interests of this country.

I can not but feel if the measure proposed had been well thought out with a view of serving the whole country, rich as well as poor, that no such measure would ever have been introduced, and the framers of this bill will yet see the day when they will appreciate most fully that what I have said is true and that they have done a great harm to the future prosperity and development of this great country.

Yours, very truly,

JACKSON JOHNSON.

THE ANTIKAMNIA CHEMICAL CO.,
St. Louis, May 11, 1917.

Hon. L. C. DYER,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. DYER: I am in receipt of your esteemed favor of the 9th instant inclosing copy of H. R. 4280, and I thank you very much indeed for sending this document to me. I am taking advantage of your request that I give you my views of the bill, and therefore call your particular attention to the following matters:

First. We are called upon to pay, in common with other industries, the following taxes:

(a) The excise tax.
(b) The income tax.
(c) The excess profits tax.
(d) Indirectly an increased tax on alcohol.
(e) Indirectly a part of the advertising tax in some instances.
(f) Upon many ingredients used in the trade a greatly increased custom tax. In addition to this we are asked to pay 5 per cent on our gross sales.

I know it is commonly believed that the patent-medicine business is all profits, whereas the truth is that it pays less profit, on the average, than any other business. There are large successes with remarkable profits—as in all lines of business—but the average manufacturer of proprietaries is not making 5 per cent profit on his gross sales, nor anything like that, while during the past two years most manufacturers of proprietary remedies have barely broken even, while many lost money.

Why should our business be taxed more than other lines? If we are making such large profits as is evidently assumed, will not the excess profits tax take care of that end of the case? There is no fair reason why we should pay all taxes others pay, including an excess profits tax, and then pay an additional 5 per cent on gross sales in cases where the business is already losing money or not making a fair profit.

I wish also to call your attention to the excess profits tax and particularly to article 3 in section 202, which provides that the good will, including trade-marks, trade brands, etc., is not included in actual capital invested, unless the corporation paid for same in actual cash or tangible property. Therefore, as I understand it, if I invest $1,000,000 in advertising to build up a business to have an actual sale value of $500,000 I can not include the $1,000,000 nor even the $500,000 actual value of the business as part of capital invested, but can only include the value of the buildings, etc., which may not amount to $10,000. But if I pay $500,000 for some one else's trade-mark, which he created just as I created mine, then I can include the $500,000 as a part of capital invested. What incentive can anyone have to build up a business by advertising and hard work if he is entitled to only 8 per cent income on the small amount invested in buildings, etc., and of the balance of income above 8 per cent he must give 16 per cent to the Government? The chances against success in advertised lines is already too small to be very alluring, and if success means a 16 per cent penalty on profits no one will care to enter such lines of business. This article 3, section 202, ought to provide that the actual value of good will and trade-marks may be included as capital invested, such value to be determined by experts in the same way that the value would be determined if one were going to buy or sell such good will or trade-marks.

Trusting that you will do your utmost to correct these glaring inconsistencies and injustice, I remain, with kindest regards, as ever,

Sincerely, yours, FRANK A. RUF.

P. S.—Since writing the foregoing I have thought of the case of an advertising agency in this city, composed of a man and his seven sons. For 40 years this family has worked to build up a business. They drew merely nominal salaries and took no profits out of the business, but by hard work, economy, self-denial, and well-directed efforts have built up a business which is now worth on the market probably $1,000,000; yet their entire tangible assets consist of office fixtures, etc., worth possibly $10,000. They employ 100 or more high-salaried people and have really a magnificent business, yet according to the proposed law their "good will" is worth nothing because they did not buy it from some one else but built it up themselves. This good will represents the earnings of eight men for years and is actually all these men have saved from a lifetime of effort and self-denial. Why does it not represent an investment in the business as much as "actual capital invested"?

CURTIS & CO. MANUFACTURING CO.,
St. Louis, May 11, 1917.

Hon. L. C. DYER,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Many thanks for your letter of May 9.

I have looked over the proposed revenue bill you kindly sent me, and in view of the present emergencies I can not, in any way, make any adverse criticism of the proposed bill except what I believe to be the fundamental error in making any of the taxes retroactive. I feel that the personal income tax and the corporate income and excess-profits tax should not be retroactive at all, but the increase should date from some day after the passage of the bill.

It is impossible for business men or business firms to accommodate themselves to upset conditions possible by retroactive laws.

As an instance of the above, I will say that I have personally made investments of dividends received this year on a basis of the 1917 tax laws, which will be entirely upset if the law is again amended as drastically as proposed. Further, Curtis & Co. Manufacturing Co. has paid dividends this year out of their earnings for the first few months of the year and reserved sufficient funds to meet the present taxes; but if the new law, with its greatly increased taxes, is made retroactive for the entire year of 1917 we will not have sufficient funds to meet the extra taxes, and will have to call on our stockholders for a refund of dividends or a contribution of new capital, and as our stock is fully paid such proceeding may not be possible.

We therefore center our only objection to the proposed revenue law on the retroactive feature, and trust that Congress may see fit to have all these new laws go into effect, say, June 1 or July 1 and not go back to January 1.

Very truly, yours,

GEO. F. STEEDMAN.

Hon. L. C. DYER,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Referring to the proposition contained in bill for raising revenue and covering the intention to make the tax on excess profits retroactive so that it may cover the profits for the year 1916, we most emphatically protest to you against the enactment of same.

It will be manifestly unjust to our stockholders that they be asked to participate to the extent of practically returning a portion of the small dividend we were able to pay them at the beginning of this year out of the profits for 1916. As such stockholders have made all their plans based on payments under existing laws, we can hardly believe the Government will wish to be a party to the disarrangement of such plan which the proposed arrangement would force.

Won't you kindly use your influence against the adoption of this proposition and oblige?

Very truly, yours,

EVENS & HOWARD FIRE BRICK CO.,
GEO. W. JONES, Secretary.

Hon. L. C. DYER,
Representative from Missouri, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: This company is impelled by its sense of duty to its stockholders to make an earnest protest against section 5 of H. R. bill No. 4280.

This section 5 proposes a tax on matters and business that had already been closed up, and we believe it would be absolutely unfair to make any corporation pay that tax as stated in section 5, equivalent to 33⅓ per cent of the taxes that have already been paid on the business and profits of 1916.

We feel that we, together with most other business institutions, will be perfectly satisfied with anything that is done in the line of what may be called war or income taxes for anything that is ahead of us; but going back and taxing business that is already closed up and settled for with all the stockholders will pave the way for more grumbling and dissatisfaction than anything else we know of.

Hence we wish to make a strong protest against this section, and, no doubt, will be joined in this by every business concern in the country.

Yours, very truly,

MAJESTIC MANUFACTURING CO.,
R. H. STOCKTON, President.

BALLARD SNOW LINIMENT CO.,
St. Louis, Mo., May 11, 1917.

Hon. L. C. DYER,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I received the schedule this morning of the new tax. As it stands now it is absolutely prohibitive. It can only result in the destruction of our business. The various taxes assessed would consume all of our profit and leave us with a large deficit at the end of the year. Such legislation as this is entirely too drastic, and there is no occasion for it. It will be a tremendous mistake for Congress to enact such laws. We are perfectly willing to assume any burden of legitimate taxation that may be assessed against us, but we do not feel that Congress has the right to enact confiscatory legislation, and that is exactly what this means. There are thousands of firms who owe large sums of money, and if this law is passed they are doomed to failure.

I can not believe that either you or any of your colleagues wish to impose any real distress upon the manufacturing and mercantile interests of this country. There are so many angles by which we are all hit by this act that the work of years which we have spent to build up our business must all go for naught unless more conservatism is shown in the assessment of this tax.

I trust you and your fellow Members of the House will use your best efforts to defeat the present bill and have one substituted that is fair and not so drastic. It seems to me that the lawmaker would comprehend what a sweeping and sensational tax this will be upon the resources of this country. It will render it impossible for thousands of firms to pay their obligations should this law be enacted.

With best respects, I am,

Yours, truly, JAMES F. BALLARD.

P. S.—Another most vicious thing is doubling the income tax for 1916. All that income has been disbursed. Now to go back would be a terrific hardship, and an extremely unjust one.

ST. LOUIS, May 11, 1917.

Hon. L. C. DYER, M. C.,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: We wish to protest emphatically against the passage of the war-tax bill now before Congress in its present form, as it is a monstrous measure, such as has never been proposed at any time anywhere in the world except in the bankrupt European countries now at war with each other; but especially against the tax of 16 per cent on excess profits over 8 per cent, which was originally 8 per cent, and, as we understand, it has been doubled. There is no question but that this part of the law is its most iniquitous part. It imposes not a tax but a special fine on our business men, which are the backbone of all trade in this country, and lets the professional man, who has nothing invested and who may earn a very large amount of money, go Scot free, and the farmer also escapes this terrible bleeding.

Nobody so far has been able to explain to us how it was possible to inject such an unjust item in the bill, except that some of the bankrupt European nations has done so.

If it is absolutely necessary to raise the money, why not simply increase the normal tax and the individual income tax enough to give the required amount? Let us be just and not arbitrary in taxing one class of people almost out of existence while the other classes are shielded.

We also understand that this bill is going to be made retroactive, which would be grossly unjust. There can not possibly be any excuse under any circumstances for making any law, no matter for what purpose, retroactive.

The bill, if passed as proposed, will bring wreck and ruin to thousands and thousands of our most valuable business men and probably a great disaster upon our entire country.

We sincerely hope that you will give this matter your most earnest consideration and that you will do all in your power to have the bill defeated or changed so that it will be equitable and that its effect will not be to rob one class of people.

We would like very much to hear from you on the subject with your assurance that you will leave no stone unturned to right this impending wrong.

Thanking you in advance for the courtesy of a reply, we are,

Yours, very truly,

HENRY HEIL CHEMICAL CO.,
HENRY HEIL, President.

Hon. L. C. DYER,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: We want to place ourselves on record as being opposed to any form of retroactive tax. We are in accord with the policy of the Government and realize that in the present emergency almost every form of taxation is necessary in order to raise adequate revenue, nevertheless, we believe that retroactive taxation can and should be avoided.

Yours, very truly,

RICE-STIX DRY GOODS CO.,
ERNEST W. STIX, President.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from North Carolina use some time now?

Mr. KITCHIN. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN] five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I had hoped—perhaps it was too much to hope—that this bill would meet with a somewhat different reception. I know, of course, and every Member of the House ought to realize, that the amount of taxes to be produced by this bill can not be imposed without working hardship upon somebody. But I had hoped particularly that we would receive some help from this House. The House has plenty of brains which the Committee on Ways and Means, having no particular pride in this provision, would be glad to avail of if something in lieu of it could be suggested which would be better and more satisfactory. The committee would like to receive the benefit of the mental capacity of the Members of this House; but, unfortunately, it seems to be used simply in tearing down and not in building up. If some gentleman would submit, along with some of these propositions to strike out certain things in this bill, some definite proposition that would commend itself to the House whereby the amount of tax involved in a certain provision which is stricken out could be restored by an equal sum, the committee would receive it with much more favor.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I was just coming to the gentleman's proposition to which he referred. The gentleman spoke of a graduated stamp tax. I appeal to the business men in this House if such a thing is practicable. My friend the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNYDER] was considering a graduated stamp tax on a check for $3,795. It would take a man 10 minutes to find out what the tax would be. He would have to put on all those stamps, then he would have to cancel them, and on every transaction he had by check he would have to go through the same performance. It is utterly impracticable, and, as I said to the gentleman from Ohio, I do not believe the proposition could get 25 votes in this House.

The gentleman from Ohio referred further to the plan of laying an additional and different tariff than we have in this bill. I would have preferred that very much from a Republican standpoint, but in dealing with this bill we have got to be practical. We know that with a Democratic majority here we are not going to get through a Republican tariff and put it on this bill, and the Republican members of the Ways and Means Committee realize that.

Mr. FESS. In fixing the one-third additional upon incomes, why would you fix it upon last year's incomes rather than to rewrite that schedule on incomes of this year?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Because otherwise it would make so heavy a payment next year, and it would make it all come in so late in the year. The Government would have nothing coming in this fall.

Mr. FESS. Do you mean that a man who pays an income tax, if he paid it all in one payment on the income of this year, would be under any greater or less burden than if he paid it in two payments, one for this year and one for last year?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. No; I do not mean that, and I do not understand the point of the gentleman's question.

Mr. FESS. You said it would be such a great amount this year.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I either misspoke or else the gentleman misunderstood me, I do not know which. I should have said that the tax for next year; that is, the tax that will be due in June of next year, would be excessively large, as the committee thought, if we carried this amount over and added it to the present income tax.

Mr. FESS. Will my colleague yield for one other question?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. FESS. Upon what principle of taxation does the gentleman from Iowa justify a retroactive tax?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. In the first place I will say to the gentleman that this is not in any strict sense a retroactive tax.

Mr. FESS. Why not?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. And then I will ask him the further question, Upon what principle of taxation would the gentleman say that we could not levy an additional tax on this year's income, a tax that is not yet due, a tax that is not yet paid? Upon what principle of taxation would he say that the Government might not increase that tax?

Mr. FESS. But that is not what you have done. You are laying a tax upon last year's income, much of which will have been invested in various ways to develop plants, and is not usable at this time.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The gentleman is making an argument now. I should like to know of the gentleman why it will be easier for these men to pay this sum next year than it would be to pay it next fall; why it would be easier for them to pay it in one installment than it would be to pay it in two, paying one next fall—a small portion of it, for it will be small—and paying the balance next year?

Mr. FESS. If that is justifiable, why can you not go back two years and three years, not only on incomes, but on everything?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The gentleman is propounding the question, If a shower is a good thing, why is not a flood a good thing? That is just the same kind of a question. [Applause and laughter.]

Mr. KITCHIN. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. LITTLE].

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, somebody has just said that this bill will be a tax on success. Well, what are you going to lay your taxation on—failure? [Applause.] Do you want to hang another millstone about the neck of him who has $150 a month, old age, and a big family? Gentlemen want to put the tax on effort. They want to take the fellow who is just climbing and getting ready to get to the point of success, and stick him. That man, who is trying to save a competence, trying to achieve a success, trying to build a home and fireside, should be encouraged, not handicapped.

As I said before, most of this bill levies its taxes upon effort. I think we ought to tax success. The gentleman said a minute ago, "Why go back to last year and levy on the money made last year?" You are going to conscript the men that were alive last year. Why not go after the money that you had last year? [Applause.] It is an odd thing to me that every eagle on a dollar that belongs to a rich man always "hollers" so much louder than the eagle on a dollar owned by a poor man when both are squeezed. [Applause.]

As an ordinary matter, I would not favor what you may call a retroactive tax, but this is no ordinary matter. This is a matter that strikes at every part of this country. Men are going to offer their lives for this country. When a man loses his life all his profits are done. Thousands upon thousands of men who "fight the flag" lest it drop on them, on small salaries, will have to pay the taxes of this country, and why should any man make a fuss about a little money that he made last year? Why, gentlemen, last year more money was made in this country by these men that the committee is going to tax than was ever made in the world before by anybody, and these men ought to be proud to come here and contribute it to the aid of this country. I am mighty glad I can get behind the committee. Before this war is over the big fortunes will be called to show their patriotism as they can afford. I was moved to speak by the suggestion of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN] that the Members of this House ought to help the committee instead of objecting so much. I have protested as much as the average Member, perhaps. The Constitution devolves on each of us the responsibility of doing his duty as he sees it, and I am glad to have three minutes to say that I think the committee has done well in this, and have done well in much of what they have done. On them was placed a sudden and tremendous burden, and they have shouldered it in harmony and concord, each conceding much to secure a country united behind the men at the front. We must expect to make similar sacrifices of our personal views for the common good of our great country. [Applause.]

Mr. MADDEN. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER].

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I hardly think the members of the committee should feel that the criticisms that are made on the various schedules in this bill are criticisms intended merely as criticisms. There are so many phases of the bill, so many titles, so many different forms and subjects of taxation, that it is inevitable that there should be differences of opinion regarding them. I sincerely hope that we may sit together and discuss these matters with some degree of intelligence, forbearance, and respect for opinions which differ from our own. Surely we will be better able to arrive at satisfactory conclusions because of discussion than we would otherwise. There can be no discussion of these propositions unless there is criticism. Gentlemen ought to recognize that, and I hope the committee will not feel that when criticism is offered against the various schedules that it is merely an attack, as the chairman of the committee says, upon the bill.

Of course, no one who has any knowledge whatever regarding taxation as it is regarded by jurists, publicists, and those who give the matter scientific consideration could say that a retroactive tax of this kind could be justified in reason. It is one class of taxation that is universally disapproved by men who have given the subject of taxation study and consideration.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TOWNER. Certainly.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Will the gentleman cite any authority in support of his statement?

Mr. TOWNER. There is no one that has ever discussed the question of taxation—for instance, Cooley on taxation, and the elementary works in the schools on taxation, that do not condemn retroactive taxation.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I would like to have some authority cited.

Mr. TOWNER. I have cited one and there are many others.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TOWNER. Yes.

Mr. FESS. If we adopt this as a principle, justified from the standpoint of the committee, what is the assurance that we will not be called upon to accept it as a general principle in the future?

Mr. TOWNER. Certainly; the gentleman's apprehension is entirely justified. I did not propose to take much time on that, but by the way, if there is any subject of taxation that ought not to be retroactive, it is that of income, because income is a current matter and after the year has passed it ceases to be income. It is either invested, paid out, or otherwise disposed of. A last year's income has ceased to be income and ought not to be subjected to an income tax.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TOWNER. Yes.

Mr. MANN. What is the difference, in the gentleman's mind, between adding to the income tax of last year not yet paid and making us pay on next year's income from the 1st of January up to the time it will be due and effective?

Mr. TOWNER. There is a good deal of difference.

Mr. MANN. What is the difference?

Mr. TOWNER. This is the difference: In the one case you know during the time when you have command of your income what is going to happen and when you will be compelled to pay it. In the other case the time is past in which you can make any computation or exercise any prudence.

Mr. MANN. Can the gentleman know what income tax he is going to pay on an income from the 1st of January of this year up to the time it becomes due?

Mr. TOWNER. No; I might not know how large the income would be.

Mr. MANN. Before the bill is introduced?

Mr. TOWNER. No; not before the bill is introduced; certainly not.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. STERLING].

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I fail to see the force of the argument that these gentlemen offer against this section of the bill. It is not a retroactive tax. All income taxes are paid the next year after the incomes are earned. The income tax we are paying this year is on last year's income. The time for payment has not yet expired. All the returns are in. There will be no readjustment of accounts. It will not be necessary for any man that pays the income tax this year to reconsider what his income was. He knows what he has paid, or, if he has not yet paid, he knows by this time just what he has to pay, because he has sent in his returns and he has received a statement from the collector of internal revenue.

Now, it is a very simple proposition for any man who has paid an income tax this year, or is to pay one between now and the 1st of June, to compute how much more this bill imposes upon him. It causes him no concern. He has only to remit to the internal-revenue collector one-third additional to the amount that he has paid or is to pay.

Mr. DILLON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. I will.

Mr. DILLON. Would not that same argument be good for 1915?

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. If it was necessary to raise a revenue by imposing a tax on incomes for the year before, it might be done. I hope it will not be necessary. We do not offer this as a desirable method but as the most desirable to which we can turn to get this large revenue. The time for payment has not expired, and the tax is not retroactive until that time has expired. This does not reach the man of small income. It applies only to incomes of more than $3,000 and $4,000.

Mr. HUSTED. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. Yes.

Mr. HUSTED. Is it not conceivable that a man may have a taxable income in 1916 and not in 1917, and yet he would be compelled to pay the additional amount of income on that which does not exist?

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. It does exist. We know the income for last year was received. In view of the fact that so large a sum is required and all ordinary sources of revenue are exhausted, this is one of the fairest propositions in this bill, and it will bring in the revenue at the time the Government most needs it. This tax we are imposing now will not be collected until June, 1918. The Treasury Department will need this money. We must meet the appropriation already made and to be made before that time arrives. The Treasury Department is now getting needed revenue by issuing short-time certificates. It has sold more than $200,000,000 already this month. This indicates to us the heavy draft on the Treasury occasioned even now by the war. This section will bring in $108,000,000 by September 15 of this year, and for that reason is much more needed now than later, when the large revenue otherwise provided for in the bill is available.

Mr. MADDEN. I yield five minutes to my colleague [Mr. CANNON].

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I do not know but that, perchance, I may vote with the committee, if the committee has pulled itself together and is going to stand together on this bill, as much as I dislike the bill as a whole; but I came into the Chamber this morning just as the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. LITTLE] was declaiming with some energy that he did not see why anybody should object to this so-called retroactive tax. I do not know but that perhaps if I lived in Kansas I might agonize and talk about the plutocrats, and all that kind of thing. I expect perhaps I would; but let us see for a minute about the gentleman from Kansas. I have reports here from the Commissioner of Internal Revenue. I find that the total contribution of the State of Kansas under the existing income-tax law as shown by that official report for the year 1916 was less than $140,000. [Laughter.]

Mr. LITTLE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON. Oh, wait a moment. I want to finish this.

Mr. LITTLE. I want to ask the gentleman a question, and it is about Illinois.

Mr. CANNON. Well, I shall yield before my five minutes are up, or, if not, try to get another minute in which to yield to the gentleman; but I want to finish this interesting story about Kansas. I find that the State of Kansas had a per capita wealth in 1912 of $2,600, counting the whole population—every man, woman, and child. A wonderful per capita of wealth! Prosperous Kansas—not bleeding Kansas—one of the most prosperous States in the Union! Why, it had almost as much per capita wealth as my great State of Illinois, which paid between five and six million dollars of income tax. Oh, yes; I expect he objects also to reducing the exemption to $1,000 for a single man and $2,000 for a married man. There is a great multitude of wonderful people in Kansas—farmers, prosperous as they never prospered before—and how the gentleman can growl and growl and growl when this bill proposes to reduce the exemption for income taxation of a married person from $4,000 to $2,000 and of a single person from $3,000 to $1,000. The gentleman is like a good watchdog, and growls when Kansas is around. [Laughter.] There, I think I have eased my mind.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield now?

Mr. CANNON. In a minute. I expect I shall come more nearly voting for this bill, if the committee will stand together in this war time, with the extraordinary taxes, possibly for the retroactive tax, so called. How will the gentleman from Kansas vote? But I grow weary of these Representatives who are more virtuous than the rest of us. [Laughter.] Now I yield to the gentleman for a question only.

Mr. LITTLE. Does the gentleman know that Kansas City, Kans., from which I come, is the second packing-house city in the world, and the proprietors of our packing houses all live in Chicago, practically, and pay most of the income tax of Chicago, and that that is the reason we growl and growl and growl and grow weary? [Laughter.]

Mr. CANNON. I do not know where these stockholders live.

Mr. LITTLE. Why, take the Armours, Morrises, Swifts.

Mr. CANNON. But Kansas City, Kans.! My, my! it is like the kick of a mosquito so far as this income comes from Kansas City, Kans. Why, your lands are worth from a hundred to two hundred dollars an acre in Kansas, and yet the gentleman is not satisfied. [Laughter.] There were only 3,000 people that paid any income tax in Kansas last year.

Mr. LITTLE. And there were 3,000,000 in Chicago that did not pay any.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. KITCHIN. I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HARDY].

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] has grown weary of Kansas, and I have grown weary of the gentleman from Illinois and those like him who are constantly holding up the fact that the poor people and the States with fewer of the great fortunes and incomes pay less of this income tax. I can take the State of Illinois and pick out a population in it bigger than that of the whole State of Texas, and that population which I pick out, being poor or moderately rich people, will not have paid a cent of this income tax. There are in the State of Illinois over 5,000,000 people who did not pay a cent of income taxes. Why does he not attack this part of his own people? It is his delight to select States that have but few great incomes and try to make it a virtue on the part of States having many citizens of great incomes because they pay this tax. If you give to Texas the wealth that Chicago or New York has and the concentrated capital that Chicago or New York has and the managing of the industries of the world that Chicago or New York has, I should be proud to have Texas pay the income tax; and so with Kansas and Alabama. These money centers draw the great incomes on which they pay taxes from the whole country. The gentleman referred to Alabama the other day, intimating that because of exemption of her farmers the State was not furnishing its quota of men without knowing apparently that every State in the Union under the Army bill will be required to furnish its proportional quota according to its population. He said the farmers in Alabama were going to be exempted.

The gentleman is constantly—and I am surprised at it, knowing his long years of continual service and his prominence—bringing into invidious comparison the fortunes and the patriotism of the different States of the Union, based on the amount of taxes paid by different States. He ought to stop it. This is a time when all patriots should stand together. But it must be recognized that wealth and property must bear the burden of taxation, while poverty and the average man bears the musket and bares his bosom to the shot and shell. [Applause.]

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARDY. If I have the time.

Mr. CANNON. The number of people who paid income taxes in Illinois last year was 28,615. The number of people who paid income tax from Texas, in round numbers, was 3,000.

Mr. HARDY. Exactly; and the number of people from Illinois who did not pay income taxes were nearly twice the number, or, to be more exact, about one and a half times the number, that there were in Texas who did not pay, and the gentleman says nothing about that.

Mr. CANNON. Oh, that is a wild guess.

Mr. HARDY. It is not a wild guess. Take your population and our population, as given by the census, and you will find it out. The time is coming when gentlemen will learn that accumulated wealth and vast incomes, wherever located, must and shall bear the greater burden of government, and bear it in a way, if legislative intelligence can devise such a way, that the rich can not levy it back on poverty. Income and excess profits taxes are an effort to find that way.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, according to every principle of justice, every man, rich or poor, should be treated alike. Every man, whether he be wealthy or poor, ought to have the same consideration under the law. Every man should be held to a strict accountability to the law. No man should be above and no man below the law. When you once levy a tax and collect it that ought to settle the question. There is no reason, no justice, no justification for making a man pay two taxes on one income in the same year. That is what you do under this item of the bill. Gentlemen here have tried to impress the House with the fact that men who pay income taxes do not fight to maintain the institutions of the country, but we conscript the men to fight, and we do not inquire whether a man is rich or poor when we conscript them. We conscript them regardless of wealth, and that was the reason for conscription. We conscript a man because we want to reach the rich as well as the poor. Every argument that has been made here has been made on the theory that because a man is rich and able to pay that he has no right that the Government of the United States is bound to conserve.

I am willing to pay the tax that ought to be levied—so is every other man—but simply because you need it to make up a certain amount in this bill and you are unable to figure out how you could raise it you are not justified in saying we will go back to the 1916 incomes and tax one-third more than we already have taken. There is no scientific study in that. That is simply taking a bludgeon, which the Government has no right to take, and use it against its citizens. Of course you have got the power, but the power that men have is best used when it is used with justice, and you can not long continue to use power unjustly and have the men against whom you use it unjustly for you. You have got to manifest some evidence of justice. Now, you say you need the money, and some say that we ought to suggest other means of obtaining it. Very well, there are other means, and, for one, I believe that the best means is the one suggested by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY]. Men who have money in the banks who are required to draw checks will not complain about the added burden of placing a stamp upon the checks, and I do not believe that as to the amount of money involved in this retroactive tax that the men would complain about it. It is not the amount of money involved that I complain about; it is the policy. If you establish a policy to-day, who knows how long it will continue; who knows when you are going back and carry on that policy during a continuation of the war or even in times of peace to meet your extravagant, reckless, and unjustifiable expenditures? We ought not to establish such a policy. It is dangerous. The people will not submit to it, no matter how willing they may be to pay money. They do not want such a policy established.

Mr. GORDON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. I will.

Mr. GORDON. Does the retroactive income tax apply to those between 19 and 25 alone, or 21 to 31 alone?

Mr. MADDEN. No; it applies to all.

Mr. GORDON. Oh, it is universal, then?

Mr. MADDEN. It applies to all, and ought not to apply to any.

Mr. GORDON. Oh!

Mr. MADDEN. It ought not to apply to any. What we should do is to so act that the people we are here to represent will realize that we are at least fair, that we understand what justice means, that they will have confidence in the men through whom they speak; but they can not have confidence in their Representatives on this floor if after they have been compelled to pay a tax they are compelled to pay that tax over again. If we can tax a man twice in a single year, why not ten times?

Mr. LANGLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. I will.

Mr. LANGLEY. I doubt not many people will have to intrench upon their savings of last year to meet the burdens of this year under these new conditions. If that is true, what is the difference in principle between that sort of a case and this proposition?

Mr. MADDEN. Why, the tax that is to be levied now for this year will be retroactive so far as going back to the 1st of January is concerned, and to that extent it is unjust, but people are willing to submit to some injustice, but they are not willing to submit to an injustice that nobody can justify, and so I say that the time has come for the Representatives of the American people on this floor to give some evidence that the power which has been placed in their hands by the people will be so exercised as to mete out justice to every man, whether he be rich or whether he be poor. [Applause.]

Mr. OLDFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH].

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, the situation that called upon the committee to recommend this tax was this. When the original estimates were submitted by the Secretary of the Treasury calling for a revenue bill of at least $1,800,000,000 two so-called retroactive methods were suggested, one to go back to the excess-profits returns for the calendar year 1916 and raise $226,000,000, and the other that which we are now considering, to go back to the income-tax returns for the calendar year ending 1916. Personally I greatly hoped that we would not be called upon to adopt either of those propositions. I, however, believe that as between the two this one is infinitely less objectionable than the other. I agree with much that has been said in opposition to this form of taxation. I agree with my colleague from Ohio [Mr. FESS] that it is unscientific. I think it is one of the two most unscientific taxation schemes provided in this bill, this and the proposed tariff of 10 per cent upon all articles on the free list.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Yes; I will yield.

Mr. FITZGERALD. If this proposed tax is so indispensable and the excess-profit tax also is in the same category, why resort to either one?

Mr. LONGWORTH. I am resorting to this one because I believe in giving the administration the money necessary to prosecute this war.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Does the gentleman think it can not be obtained in any other way?

Mr. LONGWORTH. The situation was this, gentlemen: We had been working on this bill for a good many weeks, and we found ourselves with a bill which would raise not to exceed $1,500,000,000 without resorting to this or the tariff proposal. For myself, gentlemen, I was willing to stop then. I think if we had raised $1,500,000,000 by taxation and the rest of the $2,000,000,000 by a bond issue we would have done better. [Applause.] And I want to say here now that for the present, and at least until we shall have raised far more money than we are raising now by bonds I will not support any more increased taxes. As I said the other day on the floor of the House, I do not believe it is a wise policy to finance the war by the imposition of more than 25 per cent of the cost upon the present generation. And one of the prime reasons why I am supporting this bill, to raise in the neighborhood of $2,000,000,000, is that by its very size it is going to prevent further taxation in the near future. I believe that if we shall have to raise, as I think we shall, three or four billion dollars more revenue in the not distant future, we should do it all by bond issue. If we issued $4,000,000,000 worth of bonds in addition to the $2,000,000,000 we have already authorized, and leave this tax measure where it is, we would then be raising 25 per cent of the cost of the war by taxation and 75 per cent by bonds. We would then be on what I regard as the proper basis.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I hope the gentleman will answer the question.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I have answered the question.

Mr. FITZGERALD. No. I asked the gentleman if there was no other way in which this money could be obtained.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I should be very glad to hear a suggestion from my friend from New York.

Mr. FITZGERALD. In section 504 the committee proposes a tax of 5 per cent for advertising or advertising space other than in newspapers and periodicals. Strike out the last few words "other than in newspapers and periodicals," and instead of $1,500,000 the gentleman would get $40,000,000.

Mr. LONGWORTH. The gentleman's suggestion, like all suggestions he sees fit to make, is worthy of careful consideration, which I shall be glad to give it.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY].

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Chairman, this section will yield this year $110,000,000, and that is the reason for its insertion in this bill. Yesterday Members of the House, a number of them, were willing to sacrifice two-thirds of their salary, they said. This bill taxes every man's salary one-third of the amount of his income taxes last year, and every man in this House can defend himself when he votes for it, and that is a reason for the presence of this item in this bill. This bill reaches the men who have incomes of $3,000 and $4,000, whether they live in the prosperous East; whether they live in the busy, progressive West; whether they live in the pleasant Southland or in the colder North. It reaches them wherever they are, and that is one of the reasons why this item is in the bill. This item reaches those who live in the cities if they had incomes last year of $3,000 and were unmarried, and $4,000 if they were married, and it reaches those who live in the country if they had incomes last year of that size, and that is one reason why this item is in this bill. But above all other reasons stands the reason that in this hour of the Nation's peril we need this $110,000,000, and if there were no other reason for it, that reason would be amply sufficient. Conscription, unfairness, inconvenience—these elements are all here. This war is inconvenient for this great Nation and every citizen in it. This war imposes hardships upon everyone of us. We conscript men in this war, men between the ages of 21 and 30 years, and will send 500,000 of them this year to the camps throughout this land. Unfair? Why, of course, it is. Does that apply to all men alike? Certainly not. We conscript those who are physically best able to bear arms, and not one of them between the ages of 21 and 30 years is exempt unless he is especially needed in the industries of this country. And so in this bill we conscript the incomes of the men who are able to pay. We say to those young men who are reached by the selective-draft bill that in August or September of this year you must commence the work of preparing yourselves to defend this country wherever your services are needed, and we say now to those who are financially best able to bear this burden of $110,000,000—we say to the 357,000 men in this country who paid incomes last year, "We assess you again on your wealth. You must contribute of your incomes, of your wealth." And we conscript them here and now just as we have conscripted the young men of this country.

Inconvenient for them? Yes; it is, of course; but we are subjecting the young men to burdens inconvenient to bear. Why, we will say to them, in effect, "You are drawing $100 a month; you are drawing $150 a month. Give up your salaries. Give them up, because you are between the ages of 21 and 30 years, and prepare to serve your country for $30 a month." We take away from them their salaries. We reduce the salaries of everyone of them, and very few of them are receiving less than $30 a month. And we say to everyone of them, "We take this time out of your lives; we may take your life; we take your salaries down to $30 a month, and we compel you to serve your country."

So in this bill we say to the men who are best able to pay, "We take $110,000,000 from you, proportioned according to your ability to pay incomes, your demonstrated ability; demonstrated during the last year of your lives," and we take that in order to equip these young men, in order to prepare them for their duties in defense of the flag of this country; and we say to these men who are able to pay, "In this way we compel you to serve your country," and that is justification enough for this item in this bill.

Mr. GRAY of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield to the gentleman from New Jersey?

Mr. RAINEY. If I have time I will.

Mr. GRAY of New Jersey. Will the gentleman tell me how the Government under any possible exercise of its powers and functions can make conscription retroactive?

Mr. RAINEY. Among these 500,000 men there were 30,000 men—at least that many—who were not 21 years of age last year, during the calendar year just passed. We say to them, "If you attain that age before this selective draft goes into effect you are liable to service." We conscript them whether they were 21 years of age last year or not; and every income-tax bill we ever passed is retroactive in the sense implied by the gentleman who has just addressed me that question; everyone of them. The very first one was retroactive. It provided for the payment of income taxes upon incomes earned during the preceding calendar year, and this tax proposed in this bill follows every income tax ever assessed. It imposes a tax upon the incomes of the last calendar year, just as has occurred in every year preceding the present year.

Mr. BATHRICK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield to the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. RAINEY. Yes.

Mr. BATHRICK. Is not this the illustration: A manufacturer or a business man puts aside a certain sum of money for a certain purpose, and after he has appropriated it and time goes on an emergency arises and he finds that he must have a little more money to carry on the purpose he has in mind. Is not that the illustration?

Mr. RAINEY. Yes. The gentleman's illustration is better than any illustration that I have yet used. In the transaction of the business of this country a great emergency has arisen, and the citizens of this country who are interested in the transaction of its business and who are able to pay are called upon now by this paragraph in this bill to contribute their share.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question right there?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield to the gentleman from Georgia?

Mr. RAINEY. I yield to the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. HOWARD. Is not this the other side of this proposition, that where men have paid the income tax, which this retroactively reaches, so far as this tax is applicable to that class of people who have the income tax already paid, this imposition of an income tax is a double taxation? It is impossible to present anything or to hear anything or to do anything or to say anything here. It would give a man nervous prostration so great is the confusion here. The thing I am trying to get at here is this: Is it not equivalent to double taxation, so far as these people are concerned who have already expended their income—men of small means who have already contributed?

Mr. RAINEY. Certainly not. They are not compelled to pay last year's taxes until June of this year, and they are not compelled to pay the tax imposed by this paragraph until September 15 of this year.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAINEY. They earned these incomes last year of $3,000 and $4,000, at least, and if they earned more than that they have demonstrated their ability to support their country. [Applause and cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN], which was a motion to strike out section 5.

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a division.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks for a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 64, noes 123.

So the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

Mr. DILL. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Washington offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

Mr. DILL. It is a new section, Mr. Chairman.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. DILL: Page 6, at the end of section 5, add a new section, to be known as section 6, as follows:

"All income-tax returns made by individuals shall hereafter be open to public inspection at the office of the Secretary of the Treasury or at the office of any internal-revenue collector where such returns may be on file from and after the date of filing."

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate close on that. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. DILL. Mr. Chairman, this is a new section, and I certainly ought to be entitled to five minutes on a new section. I understood the debate was closed on the other section, but as to a new section I certainly have the right to explain.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that my colleague shall have five minutes.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HOWARD. A Member does not have to have unanimous consent. Under the agreement the debate had closed on the section that we have just disposed of. The gentleman from Washington [Mr. DILL] offers an amendment as an entirely new section, an entirely new proposition; and I submit that under the parliamentary procedure of this House he has the right to have five minutes to discuss that particular amendment.

Mr. STAFFORD. If the gentleman will indulge me, the request of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] was to close debate on the section, not on the title and all amendments thereto.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this title and amendments thereto close in 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that all debate on this title and amendments thereto be closed in 10 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Washington [Mr. DILL] is recognized.

Mr. DILL. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of this amendment is to make public the income-tax returns. We are proposing in this bill to raise something near a billion dollars by means of income taxes. Without this amendment, the system offers the greatest opportunity for the evasion of taxes by those receiving large incomes afforded by any part of the bill. I want the Government to be in position to collect all of these income taxes.

The taxes on property of every kind are open to public inspection, and I know of no real reason why the taxes on incomes should not be open to public inspection. [Applause.] As stated by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLY], yesterday, the Treasury Department last year investigated a large number of suspicious income-tax returns, and found a surprisingly large amount of evasion, and as a result large sums were recovered. If those returns had been open to the public, so that individuals everywhere in the various communities might have known the amount which a man had turned in as his income, no doubt it would have been possible to have discovered much larger amounts of income that had not been returned. There were only a few thousand paying income taxes then. There will be millions paying income taxes under this bill. Besides, the rates are much higher and the temptation to evade just that much greater.

Mr. VARE. Does the gentleman believe that one manufacturer or one business man should disclose his business to all his competitors?

Mr. DILL. The amendment provides for the income-tax returns of individuals only. It says nothing about corporations.

Mr. VARE. I mean should the individual disclose his business to his competitors?

Mr. DILL. I think the amount of his income should be public; that is, the part that is to be taxed. I see no reason why it should not.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. State taxes are open to inspection.

Mr. HARDY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DILL. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. HARDY. Are not all our tax returns on private property subject to public inspection in the States?

Mr. DILL. I was coming to that. They are, and yet with all the publicity that now exists regarding all property taxes, we still have a great deal of evasion and dodging in the payment of those taxes.

Mr. HARDY. Why should not a corporation's income-tax return be subject to inspection also?

Mr. DILL. I did not include corporations in the amendment, for the reason that I understand the Government can examine the books of any corporation as the law now stands, and there may be reasons advanced why a corporation should not have its income return made public, although I would not object to publicity of the amount of corporations' incomes.

Mr. HARDY. Are there any reasons which apply to the individual that do not apply to the corporation also?

Mr. DILL. There may be. I left that out because there might be such reasons advanced as to corporate returns, but I call attention to the fact that with the embarkation upon a policy of raising something like a billion dollars or more from the incomes of men you ought to make public all income-tax returns, in order that we can discover more readily and without such great expense where incomes are being covered up and where the Government is being defrauded of its taxes.

Under present State laws it is possible to ascertain how many hogs, sheep, cattle, or other stock a man has. You can find out what investments he has and whether or not he is omitting to make a return on property or money he possesses. Now that we are to raise such large amounts from incomes, all that this amendment proposes is to apply the same publicity to these incomes.

Mr. BURNETT. Are not income-tax returns already public documents and subject to public inspection?

Mr. DILL. Not as to individuals, only the totals. You can only get the numbers of people whose incomes reach a certain amount. You can not get the individual tax return of any citizen, nor even the amount of tax he pays, and I want to remedy that condition.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Is it not possible that the gentleman's plan would encourage blackmail?

Mr. DILL. Oh, yes; it is possible, but it is very improbable. It is no more probable than that the making public of other tax returns subjects people to blackmail.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Would it not expose a business man's accounts to his competitors?

Mr. HOWARD. It would not give one man an advantage over another. Everybody would have the same chance.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Would it not open the returns to persons who might become informers for profit?

Mr. DILL. I do not see how it would. I do not see how a person's business would be in any way exposed, but it would make it possible to find out whether a man was returning his total income or not, whether or not he was concealing a large amount of money that he was receiving, by not reporting its receipt to the Government.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman's intention may be all right, but it seems to me he is putting this information in the hands of schemers, who will make improper use of it.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Putting into the hands of the Government the power to get the money.

Mr. DILL. As my colleague suggests, we can afford to do that if we put into the hands of the Government the power to get the money. It seems to me that is the important thing. I can not understand why gentlemen want to be so tender in dealing with those who receive the enormous incomes involved in this bill.

Mr. MADDEN. The gentleman said his plan would make it possible to disclose as to whether a man had made out a proper return or not. The Government has the means to discover that now.

Mr. DILL. Only through the Government officials.

Mr. MADDEN. That is the only way they could discover it anyway.

Mr. DILL. Oh, but private individuals know a great deal about other people's incomes. They would know then whether a large amount of money was not returned, and these people would immediately become of the greatest assistance in exposing the concealments of incomes by tax dodgers.

Mr. MADDEN. How would they know?

Mr. DILL. They would know in many ways, and most often through their own experiences with the individual making the false return.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Washington has expired.

Mr. KITCHIN. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY].

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, in my opinion this is the most vicious proposition that has been presented to the House. Under existing law it is a State prison offense for anyone in the employ of the Government to give the information that this gentleman [Mr. DILL] now wants published on the billboards of the country. He wants to open the books of every individual or corporation in this country who is doing business and making returns, and publish those returns to the world, the amount of the business and the secrets of the institution. Here may be two men who are competitors. There is keen competition between two men who are doing the same kind of business. One man wants to conceal his method of manufacture from his competitor because he can manufacture more cheaply than the other. This gentleman [Mr. DILL] wants to advertise that secret on the moon. I wanted an amendment to this bill providing for the publication of the names of men making returns; but to ask to have posted on the billboards of the country, to the demagogue, to the critic, to dishonest men, the amount of business and the methods of your business is bordering very close upon anarchy. [Applause.] I do not want this amendment to prevail.

Mr. KITCHIN. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. KEATING].

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY] says that the proposal of the gentleman from Washington [Mr. DILL] is anarchy. Well, it is anarchy that is approved by very high authority, because it is the kind of anarchy that was approved by Abraham Lincoln, and Abraham Lincoln was a pretty good kind of anarchist. When we had an income tax during the Civil War the returns were made public, and as high an authority as Horace Greeley, a great Republican editor, in an editorial printed in the New York Tribune on January 21, 1865, said:

So long as the income tax shall be required and levied we are satisfied that it is best for all who are honestly concerned therein that there should be no restriction on giving publicity to the items.

I hold in my hand and will insert in the RECORD editorials from the New York Herald, the New York Times, and the New York World, all great newspapers, pointing out the benefits that have resulted from publicity.

The editorials read as follows:

EFFECT OF INCOME TAX PUBLICITY DURING CIVIL WAR.

EDITORIALS IN NEW YORK NEWSPAPERS IN 1865.

[From the New York Tribune, Jan. 21, 1865.]

So long as the income tax shall be required and levied we are satisfied that it is best for all who are honestly concerned therein that there should be no restriction on giving publicity to the items. We have not the slightest objection to anyone ascertaining how much income we return and judging whether that return is full and fair. If we have not returned enough, let complaint be duly made and correction enforced.

How can this be done if the lists are shrouded in secrecy? Why shun the light if there is nothing to conceal? If there be men and women who wish to pass for rich when they are not and live in state on the plunder of their creditors and tradesmen, why not expose them? If there be men living at the rate of $10,000 a year, who swear their incomes down to $1,000, why not let the world see and scorn their unpatriotic knavery?

[From the New York World, Jan. 19, 1865.]

The publication in the World of incomes has already resulted in considerable benefit to the Government. Some rather remarkable things come to light in the process of looking over the returns and more may be made public very soon. Men whose incomes are supposed to be princely are dwindled down, when the statement is made in figures, to nothing. Fernando Wood, who owns a large amount of real estate, swears that it is all unproductive and that he has no income.

[From the New York Herald, Jan. 21, 1865.]

The object of the provision of the law for publicity of incomes was to prevent fraud, and this can certainly be best accomplished by laying the lists before as many people as possible.

[From the New York Times, Jan. 20, 1865.]

We attach very little importance to the outcry against the publication of the income-tax lists. The full list has been made public in but one district of the city, but that has made it evident that the most glaring and shameless fraud has been practiced in the return of income. If the publication of the lists will remedy this evil, equal justice and common good demand their publication, for every honest man is defrauded by those who thus escape their fair share of the public burden.

Mr. IGOE. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment to the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment to the amendment by Mr. IGOE: Strike out the word "all" and insert in lieu thereof "the amount of."

Mr. BURNETT. I ask that the original amendment be again reported.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will again report the amendment.

The Clerk read the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri.

The question was taken, and the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the amendment of the gentleman from Washington.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. DILL) there were—ayes 54, noes 129.

So the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

TITLE II.—WAR EXCESS-PROFITS TAX.

SEC. 200. That in addition to the tax imposed by Title II of the act entitled "An act to provide increased revenue to defray the expenses of the increased appropriations for the Army and Navy and the extensions of fortifications, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1917, there shall be levied, assessed, collected, and paid a like excess-profits tax of 8 per cent upon the income received in the calendar year 1917 and every calendar year thereafter by every corporation, joint-stock company or association, insurance company, and partnership. Such tax shall be computed, levied, assessed, collected, and paid, for the same years, upon the same incomes, upon the same basis, and in the same manner as the tax imposed by Title II of such act of March 3, 1917, as amended by this act.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD was recognized.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that this title be read through and that amendments then be in order to any part of it; that debate be closed in one hour and a half on the title and all amendments thereto, the time to be controlled one half by some one opposed and the other half by myself.

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, I have no objection to reading the title through, and for that matter no objection to agreeing on time for debate; but gentlemen who want to offer amendments ought to have the privilege of offering them and the privilege of a short time in which to discuss them.

Mr. CANNON. How far does this reach?

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Reserving the right to object, I have introduced an amendment and I want to discuss it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that this title be read through; that there be 1 hour and 30 minutes' debate, one half to be controlled by those in favor of the proposition and the other by those in opposition. Does the gentleman from North Carolina propose who shall control the time?

Mr. MANN. And that gentlemen who desire to offer amendments shall have the opportunity to do so.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands that recognition is to be left to the Chair.

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. Will the Chair state the request for unanimous consent again?

The CHAIRMAN. The proposition is that this Title II be read and at the end of one hour and a half amendments be offered and be pending——

Mr. MANN. No; not offered and pending, but gentlemen shall be entitled to recognition, those who want to offer amendments.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the Chair understand the gentleman that amendments shall be offered and voted on?

Mr. MANN. Certainly; and that time would not come out of the hour and a half.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands. Is there objection?

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Reserving the right to object, I desire to know if the amendment I have sent to the desk has been reported?

The CHAIRMAN. It has not been reported. The Chair thinks the gentleman from Missouri having been recognized, should now be recognized first. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the remainder of the title.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 201. That sections 200, 202, and 204 of the act entitled "An act to provide increased revenue to defray the expenses of the increased appropriations for the Army and Navy and extensions of fortifications, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1917, are hereby amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 200. That when used in this title—

"The term 'corporation' includes joint-stock companies or associations, and insurance companies;

"The term 'United States' means only the States, the Territories of Alaska and Hawaii, and the District of Columbia; and

"The term 'taxable year' means the 12 months ending December 31, excepting in the case of a corporation or partnership allowed to fix its own fiscal year, in which case it means such fiscal year. The first taxable year shall be the year ending December 31, 1917, except that in the case of a corporation or partnership which has fixed its own fiscal year it shall be the fiscal year ending during the calendar year 1917."

"SEC. 202. That for the purpose of this title, actual capital invested means (1) actual cash paid in, (2) the actual cash value of property paid in other than cash, for stock or shares in such corporation or partnership, at the time of such payment, and (3) paid in or earned surplus and undivided profits used or employed in the business: Provided, That the good will, including trade-marks and trade brands, or the franchise of a corporation or partnership, is not to be included in the actual capital invested, unless the corporation or partnership made payment therefor specifically as such in cash or tangible property, the value of such good will, trade-marks, trade brands, or franchise, not to exceed the actual cash or actual value of the tangible property paid therefor at the time of such payment.

"SEC. 204. That corporations exempt from tax under the provisions of section 11 of Title I of such act of September 8, 1916, and partnerships carrying on or doing the same business shall be exempt from the provisions of this title. In the case of professional partnerships having no substantial capital the income derived from the professional services of the partners shall be exempt from the provisions of this title. Income derived from dividends upon stock of other corporations or partnerships which are subject to the tax imposed by this title shall be exempt from the provisions of this title."

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Chairman, I now offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, on page 6, by striking out all after the word "paid," in line 16 to and including the word "partnership," in line 20, and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

"A tax upon the annual net profits in excess of 8 per cent received in the calendar year 1917 and in every calendar year thereafter by every corporation, joint stock company, or association, insurance company, and partnership. The rate of such tax shall be 8 per cent on the first 1 per cent or less of such excess, 10 per cent on the second 1 per cent or less of such excess, 14 per cent on the third 1 per cent or less of such excess, 18 per cent on the fourth 1 per cent or less of such excess, 22 per cent on the fifth 1 per cent or less of such excess, 26 per cent on the sixth 1 per cent or less of such excess, 30 per cent on seventh 1 per cent or less of such excess, 34 per cent on the eighth 1 per cent or less of such excess, 38 per cent on the ninth 1 per cent or less of such excess, 42 per cent on the remainder of such excess."

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Chairman, the amendment which I have just introduced provides that there shall be levied and collected as follows:

A tax upon the annual net profits in excess of 8 per cent received in the calendar year 1917, and in every calendar year thereafter, by every corporation, joint-stock company or association, insurance company, and partnership. The rate of such tax shall be 8 per cent on the first 1 per cent or less of such excess, 10 per cent on the second 1 per cent or less of such excess, 14 per cent on the third 1 per cent or less of such excess, 18 per cent on the fourth 1 per cent or less of such excess, 22 per cent on the fifth 1 per cent or less of such excess, 26 per cent on the sixth 1 per cent or less of such excess, 30 per cent on the seventh 1 per cent or less of such excess, 34 per cent on the eighth 1 per cent or less of such excess, 38 per cent on the ninth 1 per cent or less of such excess, 42 per cent on the remainder of such excess.

I of course understand that a section of this country will denounce me as an anarchist for having presented an amendment of this kind, yet I dare say that if it is given fair consideration it will be admitted by fair-minded men to be a reasonable and equitable tax to levy against the business interests of the country at this time of great stress.

I am not one of those who would unnecessarily or unreasonably disturb business. But I submit that a corporation that could go into the market with its stock and show that it is earning a net dividend of 8 per cent, after payment of expenses, wages, and everything else, would find a ready market. My amendment proposes to start increasing the rate not on the amount of the whole income but upon the first 1 per cent of profit in excess of 8 per cent. Much complaint against the method of taxation I propose is made here by a few of the gentlemen who come from the large cities, having among their constituents exceedingly rich people. I have heard it said that a few States are paying most of the income and excess-profit taxes. Mr. Chairman, no State is being taxed. We are taxing certain forms of property. We are taxing certain profits and incomes. We tax them wherever we find them, whether it be in Kansas or Alabama, in Chicago, Boston, or New York. There are railroads in my State, there are telephone companies in my State, there are waterworks in my State, there are electric railroads in my State, and there are electric-power companies in my State, and the people of my State pay all of the profits that the owners of those corporations make out of them. The owners of the stock in these corporations live in Chicago, in New York, in Boston; but what is the source of these vast incomes, the taxation upon which they are so anxious to escape? They come from the broad prairies of Kansas, from the productive fields of Missouri, from the rich mines and plantations of Alabama, from the oil fields of Oklahoma. Why should capitalists, because they choose to live in Chicago or New York, claim that they are paying more than their just share of taxation? I repeat, Where do they get their incomes? They get them from the people of Kansas, from the people of Missouri, from the toiling masses of all the States.

I hold in my hand a list of 44 corporations, with a table showing the amount of incomes they received in 1914, before war profits had become great, and the amount of incomes which they received in 1916, after the rush of war profits came. In the third column is the amount of the net increase as war profits over the normal profits which those corporations were receiving before the war broke out.

Net profits of 44 American industrial corporations.

[Figures shown are net profits earned for the stockholders after deducting cost of materials, labor, depreciation, overhead, interest, and all other charges. All figures are official, having been taken from the companies' annual reports.]

[1] Deficit. [2] 15 months.

Let us pause to consider some of the startling increases of profits revealed in this list.

The American Smelting & Refining Co. in 1914 earned a net profit of $9,271,565. In 1916 the amount was $23,252,248, an increase in net profits of $13,980,483.

The Armour Packing Co. in 1914 earned a net profit of $7,509,908. In 1916 the amount was $20,100,000, a net increase of $12,590,092.

Du Pont Powder Co. in 1914 earned a net profit of $4,831,793. In 1916 the amount was $82,107,693, a net increase of $77,275,900.

United States Steel Corporation in 1914 earned a net profit of $23,496,768. In 1916 the amount was $248,034,962.

The 44 companies named above made an aggregate in net profits in 1916 over 1914 of $591,666,151. This increase in net profits is simply the extra profits which these 44 companies have made out of the war.

The United States has now undertaken to pay not only her own war expenses but also to finance all of the other countries engaged in war against Germany. England, France, Russia, Italy, and the rest of the allies in turn are coming here to get their shares of our war revenue. We are dealing it out to them with a lavish hand. All war profits hereafter made either in the United States or in England or France or Italy will be largely paid out of the United States Treasury. We have no way to get the money except by taxes laid upon the people. The question, then, is where shall such taxes be laid? In my opinion they should be levied largely upon war profits, net incomes, and excess profits.

The men controlling these corporations are they who advocated the war and prompted the newspapers to push us into it. They who urged us to bear the expenses of England and her allies in carrying on the war. They who demanded conscription to force our boys into the ranks. Shall it now be said that these captains of industry are the slackers in this awful war? When we take a boy out of his home and conscript him into the Army we take his all. The bright young fellow stands at the threshold of life with his future before him. The world to him is a land of promise, and his heart is filled with hope. He looks forward to honorable achievements and the blessings of a home—a wife and children. He yearns to live and love and to enjoy the big round world which God has created in part for him. When the Army officer comes it is not a per centum of this boy that is taken, it is his all—his life, his limbs, his prospects, and his possibilities for honorable achievement, his yearning for domestic life and the perpetuation of his name and race. His everything is conscripted and he is sent away to war to fight under a foreign flag and die in a foreign land. This is a condition for which the capital class has clamored, yet many of that class are now showing themselves to be unwilling to do their part.

Mr. Chairman, I opposed going into the war. Having gone into it I still did not believe we should bear the costs of England and her allies in addition to bearing the whole expense of our own participation in the horrible conflict. But, sir, other counsels prevailed. We did go into the war and we did undertake to finance England and her allies. All of that is behind us. The war is in front of us. We must have not only men but also money. Our Government was not willing to depend upon volunteers to raise an army, but adopted conscription. Money is just as necessary as men, and we can not get volunteers to furnish it. It must be conscripted in like manner as are our boys.

It is a shame upon our country that capital is fighting against doing its part to win the war which it did so much to promote.

Capital insists that instead of raising war revenues by taxation we should resort to bond issues. But here, again, capitalists are slackers, and are not buying bonds as they should. The Secretary of the Treasury is trying to sell bonds. He has asked for several million dollars to be used in an endeavor to find purchasers. Why have not these bonds been taken up by the captains of industry who have been making such large fortunes out of war profits? These bonds are being hawked about by the Secretary of the Treasury on the installment plan in an endeavor to sell them to the poor people, because the rich will not buy. Sir, I again repeat, we must get the money like we get the men—by conscription.

We shall undoubtedly have to sell bonds if this war continues, but I believe we should, as far as we can, pay as we go. If we burden our country with a large bond issue it will make the rank and file of our people the slaves of the moneyed classes. The capitalists are not willing to pay taxes to carry on the war, and in like manner they will in after years be equally active in trying to avoid taxes to pay the principal and interest of our bonds. It is not fair to future generations of our children that we should saddle upon them the expenses of our conduct of affairs. They will have their own problems to work out and their own expenses to pay. We should not burden them with the expenses of our tasks. We are engaged in a tremendous war. Some say we have gone into it to enforce our rights upon the seas. Others say we have gone into it to reform governments on the other side of the world. Still others say we have gone into it for both of these purposes. But whatever the real purpose is it is ours and we should cheerfully put forth every possible effort to pay the expenses which we incur.

We are in the war and we must win it. We must have the necessary funds. If those who are able to provide them will not, then we must conscript them.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. FOSTER, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 4280 and had come to no resolution thereon.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. LAZARO, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 3545. An act to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States; and

H. R. 2343. An act granting consent to Ernest B. Denison, A. J. Barchfield, and Ethan I. Dodds to construct a bridge across the Wabash River within or near the city limits of the city of Vincennes, Ind.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Waldorf, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment House concurrent resolution of the following title:

House concurrent resolution 8.

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That in the enrollment of the bill H. R. 3545, entitled "An act to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States," the Clerk be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to strike out the word "member," in the fifth line of the matter inserted by the committee of conference on said bill and amendments, and to insert in lieu thereof the word "number."

WAR REVENUE.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 4280.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 4280, with Mr. FOSTER in the chair.

The Clerk reported the bill by title.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. DOWELL. I rise to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. It is not in order now. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri.

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced the noes seemed to have it.

On a division (demanded by Mr. KEATING) there were—ayes 21, noes 75.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. DOWELL: Page 6, after line 25, insert a new section, as follows:

"That section 301, Title III, munition manufacturers' tax of the act approved September 8, 1916, will be amended by striking out of the said section the words 'twelve and one-half' and inserting in lieu thereof the word 'twenty-five,' so that the same will read as follows:

"'SEC. 301. (1) That every person manufacturing (a) gunpowder and other explosives, excepting blasting powder and dynamite used for industrial purposes; (b) cartridges, loaded and unloaded, caps or primers, exclusive of those used for industrial purposes; (c) projectiles, shells, or torpedoes of any kind, including shrapnel, loaded or unloaded, or fuses, or complete rounds of ammunition; (d) firearms of any kind and appendages, including small arms, cannon, machine guns, rifles, and bayonets; (e) electric-motor boats, submarine or submersible vessels or boats; or (f) any part of any of the articles mentioned in (b), (c), or (e); shall pay for each taxable year, in addition to the income tax imposed by Title I, an excise tax of 25 per cent upon the entire net profits actually received or accrued for said year from the sale or disposition of such articles manufactured within the United States: Provided, however, That no person shall pay such tax upon net profits received during the year 1916 derived from the sale and delivery of the articles enumerated in this section under contracts executed and fully performed by such person prior to January 1, 1916.'"

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a suggestion?

Mr. DOWELL. Certainly.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I see the Clerk left out a line or whoever undertook to copy section 301, munitions factories, for my colleague left out a line in quoting it.

Mr. DOWELL. What is the line?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I just have the statute here; I have not the amendment. However, it can be corrected later, if that is the case.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment just read. I have no objection to the correction if any part of the section has been omitted. This amendment is to section 301 of the act passed in September, 1916, which is Title III, munition manufactures tax, and the change which this amendment makes to the present law is to increase the tax provided in that act from 12½ per cent on the net profits to 25 per cent. Now, I want to call the attention of the House to the situation as we have it here. In this bill we are seeking to raise practically $2,000,000,000. We are laying heavy taxes upon nearly all of our citizens and all of the business interests of the country, and while all of the taxes have been materially increased in this bill your committee has not seen fit to increase the manufacturers' tax on munitions a single penny. In 1916, when we were raising taxes while at peace, your committee found it equitable and proper to place a tax of 12½ per cent upon the munitions plants, but not a single reference to these taxes has been made in this bill. My purpose now is to double the tax placed upon these factories a year ago while we were at peace and place upon the munition plants a little of this additional burden that you are placing upon everybody else. And I want later in the bill to see amendments adopted reducing the burdens upon those not so able to pay. This amendment is not as high as I believe it ought to be. I believe, when we take into consideration the fact that many of these munitions plants have so enormously increased their profits since 1914, that this Congress should not pass a bill which carries practically $2,000,000,000 and permit these manufacturers to escape the burden placed upon the people by this bill. This amendment should be adopted, and I would accept an amendment to place even heavier burdens upon these factories.

The large profits which these concerns have been making during the war not only justify this increase in taxes but with the increase suggested in this amendment they would not then be paying their fair share of the sums sought to be raised in this bill. In the past few weeks this Government has appropriated vast sums of money for the purpose of carrying on the war. These appropriations cover many and varied expenditures of the Government. But in the preparation for war necessarily large parts of these appropriations find their way to the munition factories, and these factories have been receiving, and will be receiving, enormous profits from these war contracts.

I am submitting a statement or schedule of comparison, purporting to come from "the American Committee on War Finance," relating to the earnings and increased net profits of the stockholders of some of these great corporations during the past few years, and I ask that the same be placed in the RECORD here.

The statement referred to is as follows:

WHERE THE TAXABLE WEALTH IS.

Where, then, has the Nation's prosperity gone since the world war began—into whose pockets? And, above all, where may we find the accumulations of wealth which may now be taxed to pay for the war with the least hardship or injustice to the public?

The following figures, selected almost at random from the great list of industrial corporations that have profited by war times may suggest the answers to the above questions. They may also indicate the economic conditions which lie below the fact, reported by Prof. King, of the University of Wisconsin, that 2 per cent of the people of the United States own 65 per cent of the country's total wealth.

The figures shown are the net profits earned for the stockholders, after deducting cost of materials, labor, depreciation, overhead, interest, and all other charges. All figures are official, having been taken from the companies' annual reports.

[1] Deficit. [2] 19 months. [3] 15 months.

Taking 24 of the principal companies listed above and comparing their earnings in 1914 and 1916, we find in these two years an increase of 500 per cent, and these increases may be expected to continue. For instance, the steel corporations' last quarter's earnings, just published, would indicate that; for, if the percentage is maintained for the whole year, the net sum applicable to dividends for 1917 should be about $450,000,000.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PLATT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOWELL. I have but a moment. I would be glad to yield otherwise.

Now, under the schedule submitted by the American Committee on War Finance these munition plants have profited practically 500 per cent since 1914. The distinguished gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH] has frequently suggested that the taxes are being paid by a small number of the people of the United States. This not only has been stated but it has been restated and stated again. But does the gentleman know that the committee above referred to states that 2 per cent of the people of the United States own practically 65 per cent of the wealth of the country? And if this be true, why should not these heavy burdens be placed upon the men who are accumulating these great fortunes by these magnificent profits they have been receiving?

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOWELL. Certainly.

Mr. CANNON. I absolutely deny the statement that 2 per cent of the people own 65 per cent of the property.

Mr. DOWELL. As I stated, this is from the American Committee on War Finance. It is over their signature in this paper. I take the committee for this statement.

Mr. CANNON. That is Mr. Pinchot's statement, is it not?

Mr. DOWELL. I know not whose statement it is, but I know it purports to come from this committee, and I have not heard it contradicted except from the gentleman now.

Mr. CANNON. I contradict it. It is utterly misleading, utterly unreliable, and utterly untrue.

Mr. DOWELL. Whether the question of the percentage is correct or not is immaterial. It is a fact, however, that there are a number of people in the United States engaged in the manufacture of munitions. It is also a fact that they have been receiving enormous profits, profits unheard of and unknown before in this country, and it seems to me that when such heavy burdens are being placed upon the people of this country we ought not to pass these gentlemen by without even a reference to them in this bill. We ought to place some of the extra burdens upon these enormous profits acquired by these munition factories because of the war rather than to add the heavy burdens you are placing upon the rest of the people of the United States and rather than disturb the business of the country. If these munition factories are receiving the profits it is claimed they are receiving, this Congress should demand that they pay at least their fair share of these taxes. I think they should pay much more than is called for in this amendment. I am utterly unable to understand why this amendment should be opposed.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman yield further for a single question?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. DOWELL] has expired.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Is the gentleman opposed to the amendment?

Mr. MONDELL. I am, as it stands.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming is recognized.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I am not opposed to the amendment because it proposes an additional tax on the profits of munition factories, assuming they are making large profits. I know nothing about it, except by general report. I would very gladly support an amendment that laid an additional tax on the abnormal profits of all the corporations and all the copartnerships and associations in the country. We make a very great mistake when we imagine that in time of war the only people who make abnormal profits are the men who make munitions of war. There are corporations making clothing, boots, and shoes for armies—selling coal at two and one-half times what it was sold for a year and a half or two years ago, without any corresponding increase in the cost of production——

Mr. COOPER of West Virginia. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. I have only five minutes.

Mr. COOPER of West Virginia. Has not every article that goes into the production of coal increased very materially?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes; I think so. My understanding is there has been an increase of, say, from 15 to even as high as 25 cents a ton in the cost of the production of coal.

Mr. COOPER of West Virginia. Has not the price of steel rails gone from $25 to $60 a ton?

Mr. MONDELL. I appreciate there has been an increase in the cost of articles used in the production of coal as well as in labor costs. I did not rise for the purpose of going into the coal question, but, as the gentleman is interested in that matter, I will go into it for a moment. There has been a very considerable increase in the cost of the production of bituminous coal, and bituminous coal is what I have in mind. I am quite certain that the increase in the cost of production of bituminous coal the country over, taking everything into consideration, will not amount to 50 cents a ton, and I believe that 25 cents a ton is nearer the increase in the average cost. On the other hand, the price of bituminous coal at the mines has increased from an average of about $1.25 a ton, mine run, to about $3.50 a ton, mine run. And assuming for the sake of argument there has been an increase in the cost of production of 50 cents per ton, which there has not been, that does not account for the increase of from $1.50 to $2.25 a ton for coal at the pit mouth. I know of no people in this country who have been making more out of the war than the bituminous coal miners of the country.

Mr. KNUTSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. I believe they are entitled to a good profit, because I am told that prior to the outbreak of the war, for quite a number of years, many operators made but very little. They had a very hard time of it, and I think they are entitled to get some profits out of the war; but it does not follow that they are entitled to make the enormous profits they are now making in time of war without bearing some part of the burden of the war on those additional profits.

Now, that is only one industry, and I have no special industry in mind. What I rose to say was this, that the difficulty about this excess-profit tax is that it lays a burden on all profits, whether they be reasonable or unreasonable, normal or abnormal. The English excess-profit tax is a much fairer, a much more equitable tax, and I am in hope that some one will offer—I understand the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD] has been considering such a proposition—a provision along the line of the English excess-profit tax, modified to meet our situation.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wyoming has expired.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I ask that I may have five minutes more.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Chairman, I move that the gentleman's time be extended five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The gentleman, I suppose, has gone into the details of the English profit tax?

Mr. MONDELL. I will not say that I have gone into the details thoroughly or carefully, but I think I understand in a general way what the underlying principle is, and in the brief time I have I will try to explain what I believe to be a proper modification of the English provision under our conditions.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Would the gentleman care to be interrogated about the English provision?

Mr. MONDELL. I regret I have not the time, but if the gentleman prefers, let us assume that there is no English excess-profits tax, and talk about an American excess-profits tax that would be fair and equitable. That will clear the situation. I know of no war tax more equitable, more fair, more reasonable than a tax upon abnormal and unusual profits arising in time of war. [Applause.] Such a tax is more equitable than the ordinary income tax, for the ordinary income tax may be levied on an income derived from profits of 2 per cent or 3 per cent, or even 1 per cent. On the other hand, an excess-profits tax, if properly levied, is laid only upon profits well above normal. In such a tax your levy would be on the benefits that the corporation receives from the conditions of the war. Certainly no one can in reason object to paying back to the Government a part of the excess profit that a condition of war gives him.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. DOWELL. Does not the munition manufacturer receive an abnormal profit?

Mr. MONDELL. He may, but he is not the only one who does, and an excess profit due to war is a legitimate object of taxation without regard to its source. The trouble with the gentleman's amendment is, first, that it would levy a very heavy profit tax on all profits, even if they were not more than 1 or 2 or 3 or 4 per cent on the investment, whereas a proper excess-profits tax should only be levied upon profits that are above normal, that are unusual, that are abnormal, and that in many cases are obtained by wringing from the people an exorbitant price for the necessities of life. [Applause.] That is the sort of a profit we ought to reach and the sort of a profit that we ought to tax heavily.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. I yield.

Mr. CANNON. The $1.50 or $2 corn, the $2.50 wheat, the 20-cent cotton, and other advances all along the line are not proposed to be touched, yet they are war profits. That is the proposition. They far exceed in amount what we are trying to reach.

Mr. MONDELL. I understand that any argument you might make in regard to the levying of any tax might be met with a statement that there are other sources from which you could equitably and properly secure revenue. But by and large, and in the main, the prices that a farmer actually receives for his product, even in time of war, are not great, compared with the increases in the cost of production. But on the other hand, the man who buys the farmer's wheat at $1.30 or $1.40 a bushel, or even $1 a bushel, and sells for $2 or $3 or $3.12 a bushel is obtaining an abnormal and extraordinary profit out of the conditions of war. It is that kind of a profit that I should like to reach with an excess-profits tax. My opinion is that if you had a law reaching that kind of a profit, or any other abnormal profit wrung from the necessities of the people, and taxing it heavily, you would by that means do more to discourage the making of abnormal and thieving profits by raising the cost of the necessities of life than you can do in any other way. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wyoming has expired.

Mr. MONDELL. May I have five minutes more, Mr. Chairman?

Mr. STAFFORD. I guess the gentleman is not aware that the time is limited and has been divided.

Mr. MONDELL. No; I did not know that. In that case I withdraw my request. I do not wish to take time that some one else has been expecting to use.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BORLAND: Page 7, strike out from line 23 to the word "business," in line 3, page 8, and insert:

"SEC. 202. That for the purpose of this title the actual capital investment shall be taken to be the fair market price or value of all assets, real, personal, or mixed, owned and used in connection with the business at the beginning of each accounting period for which the tax is to be computed."

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, the present law on the subject of the excess-profits tax provides that where the capital stock has been paid in property the valuation shall be the value of the property at the time the property was turned in.

That has always been a very lame provision in the law, and it will continue to be a lame provision, and it will get much worse, of course, with this present increase in the excess-profits tax. The value at which the property was turned in at the time the corporation was created is absolutely no indication of the value of that property to-day or of the working capital of that corporation. The property might have been turned in at a value that had shrunk away to nothing, and yet that corporation would be entitled to earn its dividends—8 per cent—on the valuation set upon that property at the time it received it 20 years ago. It might have been an oil well; it might have been a mine; it might have been a leasehold on a mine that to-day has only a nominal value, and yet honestly stands on the books of that corporation at the time it was received as of a certain value. That is one bad feature of this provision.

The opposite of the case is just as bad. A man is entitled to the legitimate value of his property to-day, not what it was worth 20 years ago. That feature especially appealed to the southern timberland people and to the northwestern timberland people, too, for that matter. Twenty, thirty, or forty years ago, when these timberlands were turned in to the corporation, they may not have been worth a dollar an acre for standing timber. To-day they may be worth $8, $10, or $12 a thousand, board measure, the actual worth. Yet those particular corporations which are the principal sufferers by this provision, are to be limited to a profit tax upon the value of the property at the time they received it. As I say, that is a very lame provision. It is a provision that was not originated in this law.

Mr. COX. In what way does the gentleman's amendment propose to meet that?

Mr. BORLAND. I propose that the value of the property shall be taken as of the beginning of the period for which the tax is computed. My amendment is that the property shall be valued as of the 1st of January, 1916, if you are going to assess it for the year 1916.

Mr. COX. That is a physical valuation?

Mr. BORLAND. Yes.

Mr. COX. In other words it is the cash value.

Mr. BORLAND. Yes.

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. Has the gentleman calculated the length of time it will take to make that valuation?

Mr. BORLAND. That would not be necessary.

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. Or the force of men that would be required.

Mr. BORLAND. Oh, no; every corporation has an inventory of its assets up to the end of its fiscal year, and on that valuation it usually pays local taxes of some kind.

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. Does the gentleman know how long it has taken to value the railroads?

Mr. BORLAND. The railroads have to be valued as a special proposition.

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. Does the gentleman know how long it has taken to value them?

Mr. BORLAND. I am not sure that this excess profits tax applies to the railroads, or could apply to them under any circumstances, because I do not think there is any railroad in the United States to-day that you could prove has made more than 8 per cent on its capital investment.

Mr. KITCHIN. Suppose the Interstate Commerce Commission raises the rates of the railroads 15 per cent.

Mr. BORLAND. How much taxes are you collecting from the excess profits of railroads now?

Mr. KITCHIN. I do not know.

Mr. BORLAND. I venture to say you are not collecting $10,000, so it just leaves the railroads clear out.

Mr. KITCHIN. Unless you put in the words "except railroads," it will require a physical valuation of them anyway.

Mr. BORLAND. All right, I will do that. I will except the railroads if there is any danger of that whatever.

Mr. KITCHEN. And if the Interstate Commerce Commission permits the railroads to raise their rates 15 per cent of their gross receipts, I think a lot of railroads will make more than 8 per cent.

Mr. BORLAND. They will never make that raise with my consent.

Mr. KITCHIN. I do not think they ought to have any increased rates, but they are trying to get them.

Mr. BORLAND. If the gentleman from North Carolina thinks the railroads will escape under this, I am perfectly willing to modify my amendment. I have never seen a dollar of excess profits taxes coming from them, but if they are earning any excess profits I do not want them to escape taxation upon them.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. BORLAND. I yield.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The Chicago, Burlington & Quincy Railroad made enough to pay 20 per cent on its common stock this year, and the Union Pacific made even more than that.

Mr. BORLAND. Let us not waste any time on railroads, because we are agreed as to them. If the gentleman has any fear on that, I am willing to exclude them; that is, to except common carriers. Now, we will assume that the amendment is modified so as to except common carriers, and it gets right down to business corporations. Every man who has been connected with a business corporation knows that the poorest way to value that corporation is by the value turned in at the time the corporation was formed. Why, that kind of a proposition usually would result in fraud, because in many States there is no protection at all against the price that the corporation sets upon the property it received. I venture to say that 20 years ago it was universal in this country that there was no limitation or protection against the price at which a corporation might take property in exchange for its capital stock. It might dispose of its capital stock for fresh air and blue sky. Yet under this law it would be entitled to earn 8 per cent profit on any extravagant valuation that it had put on such property at the time it received the same before it would be liable for any excess-profits tax.

Mr. COX. The laws of my State—of Indiana—as I recall, require all corporations to submit semiannually the total value of their tangible property.

Mr. BORLAND. So they do in Missouri and, I think, in most other States.

Mr. COX. Does the gentleman know how many States of the Union have laws of that kind; and if they have, why could not the returns under such laws be accepted as the basis on which to fix this valuation?

Mr. BORLAND. They could.

Mr. COX. And they would be estopped from saying that they had made an erroneous statement.

Mr. BORLAND. The State of Missouri requires a return to be made, and I think that possibly 40 of the 48 States require such corporation returns to be made annually as a basis on which they levy some kind of a corporation or occupation tax.

Mr. COX. Why could not that be accepted?

Mr. BORLAND. It could be accepted very easily as a method to check the falsity of their statements. It might not correspond exactly in date with the date when they would have to make the return.

Mr. HELVERING. A certain company have a trade-mark that they claim is worth a million and a half of dollars. They have never been offered that for it or had it on the market for sale. Would the gentleman include that as a part of the capital of the company?

Mr. BORLAND. If your State would permit them to include that among their tangible assets, I presume we would have to include it. That is the value your State would permit.

Mr. HELVERING. It is not in my State.

Mr. BORLAND. But as a general thing the law excludes, I think, the good will of a corporation, or anything that is not tangible. It refers only to property which has a tangible money value. But it does seem to me that this question about requiring a physical valuation by some Government official is not an answer to this proposition. There is no class of corporations as to which it could be required except the railroad corporations, and we can just as well exclude them right now, because we will not make or lose a dollar of revenue in the way of excess profits tax, in my opinion, by excluding them.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BORLAND. Now I ask unanimous consent to modify my amendment by putting in the words "except common carriers."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent to modify his amendment as indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BORLAND. That will come in after the word "partnership," line 1, page 8.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I hope the committee will not adopt the amendment. We would not get any tax under his proposition, and we would lose what we have got. It would take the department 10 years to make a physical valuation of all the corporation property under his provision. It would cost fifty to a hundred million dollars to administer such a provision as that.

Mr. BORLAND. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. BORLAND. The gentleman knows that every State requires corporations to turn in a statement of their physical assets.

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes; but they take their word for it. We would have to value it as we do the railroads.

Mr. BORLAND. Suppose it could be checked up by that, as is the statement of the gentleman as to his income tax.

Mr. KITCHIN. Oh, yes; but my statement is about my income. They do not ask me to value my farm, my property, or what I have invested in buildings; they take my statement of the income. I will say that there is not a country in the world of the five or six that have excess profits taxes, that takes the proposition involved in the gentleman's amendment. The other body at the last session, in dealing with this subject, put in a proposition very similar to this offered by the gentleman from Missouri; but when they found out what it involved they unanimously agreed to take it out because it would do just what I say it will do, and I hope that the committee will vote it down.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to withdraw the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent to withdraw his amendment. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. STRONG. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. STRONG: Page 6, line 25, after the word "act," insert:

"Provided, That corporations, joint-stock companies, or associations and partnerships, engaged in the manufacture or production of staple articles of commerce, involved in indebtedness created in the construction, maintenance, or repair of their manufacturing or producing plants, and whose said indebtedness shall not be represented by outstanding bonds or by mortgages supporting said bonds, which indebtedness was, prior to the passage of this act, legitimately charged against their construction, maintenance, or repair accounts, may first deduct from their net earnings a sufficient sum to liquidate said indebtedness before being subject to the excess profits tax as herein provided and as provided in the act of March 3, 1917."

Mr. STRONG. Mr. Chairman, there are in this country thousands, yes, hundreds of thousands, of business men who are bitter toward their Government because of the nagging attitude it has maintained toward them during the past 12 or 14 years. Beginning with the Northern Securities case, the "trust-busting" campaign, carried on through three administrations, has accomplished little if anything of benefit to the people, while on the other hand great injustice has been done and hardships imposed upon thousands of small corporations and business organizations in the country. It seems that when reference is made to corporations a majority of the Members of Congress and other legislative bodies think only of Standard Oil, the United States Steel, and probably a few other of the larger interests. They do not think of a hundred thousand small corporations they never heard of and do not know about. In the hope of "getting" certain large concerns, the Congress passed a law declaring that business methods which had always been accepted as entirely honest and legitimate because of changed conditions had becomes crimes. But the law was so vague in terms that years passed before the Department of Justice brought prosecution under it. The first suit was brought more as an experiment, and at the time not a lawyer in the country, either within or without the Department of Jusice, thought there was anything in the law, and so the business men, under advice of counsel, continued to follow the beaten path, and it was not until the Supreme Court exercised the last guess, and handed down an interpretation under which they were subject to fine and imprisonment, did they know they had been doing wrong. But neither the large concerns the law was intended to catch nor the men connected with them have been made to suffer. It has been the small concerns, the man in the small town or village, who has been punished because he, with a few associates, anxious to have some labor-employing enterprise in their town for the benefit of the community, joined forces and built a factory of some kind.

When they took out a charter in order to fix their several interests in their little enterprise, they instantly became in the eyes of the cheap politician that damnable and dangerous thing called a corporation. For every one large corporation the professional politician has in mind when he declaims against them, there are ten thousand of these little concerns in the country he would make suffer. I have no brief from the corporations, either large or small. It was in the indorsement and support of labor organizations which elected me to Congress, and I am proud of it. I am simply speaking as an observer somewhat amused to note that certain men secure public office by taking a stand against corporations in the interest of the "peepul," and also observing that just in the degree that they are uninformed do they raise their voices and like a hound dog baying the moon do they howl about the crooked and criminal corporations and the small concerns in the small towns of the country which have been created more for the purpose of giving employment to labor rather than with any particular hope of making money, are made to suffer through fool laws which such politicians succeed in writing in the statute books. And in like manner, if the bill under consideration becomes a law in its present form, it will not hurt the large corporations able to pay the tax, but it will do injury to many small concerns in the country. The bill is framed to secure a substantial share of the excess profits of corporations, which is all very well, and with which I agree, but no thought is given to the thousands of small concerns which the Government forced out of business in its campaign to regulate big business, which have resumed operations to take advantage of better price conditions growing out of the war and to comply with the suggestion of the President that the manufacturers of the country should, as a matter of duty, operate their plants and if possible increase production. To resume operations in some cases and to increase production in others thousands of these small concerns have been compelled to borrow money to repair or enlarge their plants. Having no credit, in many instances, patriotic citizens have indorsed for them at local banks in order to get them started.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Pennsylvania is making a very interesting speech, and I ask unanimous consent that his time be extended five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Nebraska?

There was no objection.

Mr. STRONG. I now contend that these small concerns should be permitted to deduct a sufficient sum from their net earnings to pay these particular debts, legitimately charged against their construction account prior to the passage of this act, before being subject to this excess tax. It will not only be fair, but I believe it will be good judgment to show this consideration for the manufacturers and producers of the country.

I want to add that there are so many unsatisfactory provisions in the bill under consideration that I shall vote against it unless subsantially amended. That a revenue bill should be introduced in the Congress so unscientific in its terms that the only justification for it offered by its advocates is that "we need the money" is absolutely without excuse. The same reason for wrongfully taking money from defenseless victims has been offered by every pirate and highwayman from the days of Capt. Kidd and Claude Duval down to the present time. There is no real necessity for rushing a bill through Congress which no one can justify except on the plea of the highwayman. We declared war and then fussed around for six weeks before we authorized the recruiting of an army. If that Army, when in action, follows the example of Congress in the matter of speed, then God save the Republic. It seems to me the entire attention of the Congress should have been concentrated on the quick establishment of an armed force, for which immediate needs could be met with a bond issue, and sufficient time should be taken to prepare a revenue measure which would work the least possible injury to the business interests of the country. Those of us who criticize this bill are just as anxious to raise the money to carry on the war as those who support it in its present form. Having voted for war, we must, of course, vote the necessary money to carry it to a successful conclusion, but that does not mean we should run amuck through the business interests of the country, cutting and slashing with no consideration for their welfare. [Applause.] I am in favor of taking care of the men who make the wheels go round, and in view of the fact that no one knows how long the war will last, how long our people will be burdened with heavy taxes, and the fact that we must not only raise large sums for our own requirements, but also for our allies, it seems to me that if there ever has been a time in the history of our country when extreme care should be exercised in framing a revenue bill, instead of adopting what is admittedly a makeshift, it is the present time.

Mr. Chairman, I do not know whether my motion will prevail, but I will have this satisfaction, that I shall have given the business men of this country at least an opportunity to gauge the correct attitude of this body toward them. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STRONG].

Mr. FARR. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the amendment be again reported.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will be again reported.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I object.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. GOOD: At end of line 22, page 8, insert a new section, as follows:

"SEC. 205. That in addition to the taxes under existing laws and in addition to the taxes imposed by section 200 hereof, there shall be levied, assessed, collected, and paid a like excess-profits tax of 30 per cent in the calendar year 1917, and every calendar year thereafter, by every corporation, joint-stock company or association, insurance company, and partnership, on that portion of the net profits of any such corporation, joint-stock company or association, insurance company, and partnership in excess of the normal profits of any such corporation, joint-stock company or association, insurance company, and partnership. That in determining the normal profits of any corporation, joint-stock company or association, insurance company, and partnership, the Commissioner of Internal Revenue shall take the net profits of any corporation, joint-stock company or association, insurance company, and partnership for the years 1912, 1913, and 1914, and the average net profits for said years shall constitute the normal profits of any such corporation, joint-stock company or association, insurance company, and partnership. The Commissioner of Internal Revenue shall make due allowances for any and all additions to or reductions in the capital invested after January 1, 1915, by any corporation, joint-stock company or association, insurance company, and partnership, on the basis of 8 per cent per annum. In determining the normal profits of any corporation, joint-stock company or association, insurance company, and partnership not engaged in business during any or all of the years of 1912, 1913, and 1914, the Commissioner of Internal Revenue shall in the manner above prescribed ascertain the normal profits of any such corporation, joint-stock company or association, insurance company, and partnership during such time as any such corporation, joint-stock company or association, insurance company, and partnership was engaged in business prior to January 1, 1915; that the normal profits of any corporation, joint-stock company or association, insurance company, and partnership organized subsequent to January 1, 1915, shall be deemed to be 10 per cent on the capital invested: Provided, however, That if the net earnings of any such corporation, joint-stock company or association, insurance company, and partnership shall be less than 10 per cent per annum on the capital invested then, and in that event, an additional tax shall be levied by this section."

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, if the amendment I have offered is adopted quite a number of the oppressive provisions of this bill that impose purely consumption taxes may be eliminated. If adopted many of the taxes imposed on legitimate industry may be greatly reduced. We are all agreed that we must finance this war, but in financing it we ought to adopt some general comprehensive plan that will reduce the burden on the great mass of our people to the minimum. The plan should be so comprehensive that it would afford a minimum of hardship to legitimate industry. It should at the same time place as much of the burden as possible on those who make abnormal profits out of the war. I believe the English system of taxation for financing the war is conceded by 75 per cent of the membership of this House to be far better than the system here proposed in this bill.

The amendment I have offered will accomplish this and only this: It does not place a penny of additional tax on normal profits. It imposes an additional tax of 30 per cent on war profits. It taxes war profits only. In order to make the amendment harmonize with the text of the existing law and the provisions of this bill I have designated these profits as excess profits, or profits in excess of normal profits. The amendment can best be understood by applying its provisions to a given case. Take a concern like the Hercules Powder Co., for example. Last year that concern had a net profit of $16,658,873. Under this amendment, if adopted, the Commissioner of Internal Revenue will ascertain what the normal profits of the Hercules Powder Co. were during the three years before the war—that is, for 1912, 1913, and 1914. The normal profits of that concern for those years was, in round numbers, $1,000,000 per year. The amendment does not propose any tax on those normal profits of $1,000,000, but in ascertaining the amount of the tax the Commissioner of Internal Revenue would subtract $1,000,000, the normal profits, from the abnormal profits of $16,658,873, made in 1916. He would find that the Hercules Powder Co. for 1916 had a war profit of $15,658,873. On this he would compute a tax of 30 per cent, and out of these war profits this concern would be compelled to pay to the Government $4,697,661.90. Is there any injustice in such a tax? Would any hardship result from the imposition of such a tax? Would a single man, woman, or child in the United States be compelled to wear poorer clothing or to eat less food because of such a tax? The hardship and suffering through the imposition of such a tax would be reduced to the minimum. No person in this time of stress should be allowed to make and retain a profit like that. My amendment, if adopted, would take 30 per cent of the war profits of every person and every corporation in the United States to support the war. That is what the English system does. Only under the English law to-day they take 80 per cent of the war profits to support the war.

I have in mind now a block of coal stock which has been held in my section of the country for a number of years. It is reported to be largely watered stock. It has not paid any dividends for a number of years, and, in so far as it is pure water, it ought never to be permitted to pay any dividends. The owner of that stock is, I am credibly informed, receiving a weekly dividend of over $2,000. Think of it. This bill imposes only a normal tax on that corporation. It proposes to take no more of the war profits of that corporation than it does of the corporation whose profits have not increased a dollar because of the war. We put a tax on telephone bills, on heat, bills, on electric-light bills, water bills—purely consumption taxes—and everyone knows that in these times of stress the bills of the ordinary consumer are more than he can bear. But it is not proposed at all to reach out and make an exception of the class that profits because of the war. These war profits exist all over the country. Men are ambitious to make money, and their avarice too often permits them to raise the prices of the necessaries of life. And if this amendment is adopted it will tend to regulate prices and at the same time it will reach those same large concerns that have been engaged in making a horizontal increase, not only in war supplies but in the necessaries of life, and it will take 30 per cent of their war profits to support and carry on the war.

I have here a compilation, made of more than 40 large American industrial corporations, which shows at a glance how some of these concerns are reaping tremendous war profits. I will insert it in the RECORD. It is as follows:

Net profits of American industrial corporations.

[1] Deficit. [2] 19 months. [3] 15 months.

How any thinking, patriotic American can read that statement and oppose a substantial tax on war profits I am unable to understand. Take the Phelps-Dodge Corporation, for instance. Last year its net profits were $21,000,000, as against a normal profit of around $7,000,000, or a war profit, if you please, last year of $14,000,000. Would it be a hardship on anyone to take $4,200,000 of its war profits to carry on the war? If so, who would suffer? Who could object to such a tax? The authors of this bill only propose to take from concerns like these, according to their estimate, something like $200,000,000 a year, and at the same time they propose to levy a tax on articles that will be imported into the country that will yield about a like amount. The question this committee puts up to me is to vote a tax on tea and coffee, a tax on the American breakfast table, when to pay it would amount to positive suffering for millions of our people, and at the same time to allow these large war profits to go almost scot free, so far as financing this war is concerned. And they do practically go scot free. The amount of the tax, as compared with their tremendous profits, is very small. Without a war these profits would have been impossible. Then why should they not bear a good share of the expense of the war which created such profits? When your bill was reported the price of the stocks of these large concerns on the New York Stock Exchange commenced to rise. Your bill was welcomed by Wall Street, and rightly so. Some of the stocks in these large concerns have since this bill was reported advanced more than 10 points. But the bill will be felt by another class of our people. By them it will not be welcomed; by them it will be despised. In its present form it ought to be despised and repudiated by the membership of this House. You conscript the men, but hesitate to conscript the millions of war profits. Some one should explain why.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I am surprised and even astonished at my colleague in offering this amendment. He has been the author of so much good legislation in this House, and has been a highly valuable Member during his something like eight years of service, has always been careful in the preparation of his bills and any amendment that he has offered, but I am surprised that he should offer this amendment at this time and in the manner and form in which it is presented. I am, however, obliged to him in one respect, because he has greatly relieved my mind on one point. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MCCORMICK] insisted here the other day that the business men were alarmed, that they were frightened on account of this bill; they were scared, they would not take the bonds, and now my colleague reassures us upon that point that we are all right, that Wall Street is welcoming the bill, and that it is satisfactory to the business men of the country. I am very glad of it, because I think it will be satisfactory to those working people who will have to pay only 5 per cent or less of the total taxes that are here imposed.

Mr. Chairman, I wish some of these gentlemen who have talked so much about the English excess-profits tax were present at this time. Many Members of the House have spoken about it, and extolled it; but I will wager a dinner for all that are present here that there is not 1 per cent of the membership of the House that has even read the English excess-profits tax, and unless my colleague reassures me by saying that he has I would not believe that he has.

Mr. GOOD. I have it, and I have taken the trouble to have a copy of it, and I would like to submit it to the tender consciences of the Committee on Ways and Means. They do not seem to have considered it at all.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Oh, I will take the gentleman's word for it.

Mr. SLOAN. Now, which one of these gentlemen wins that wager? We are all present here ready to go to dinner.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I did not bet upon my colleague, because I knew that he would protect himself against bets.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I want to get on with what I have to say.

Mr. COX. I would like to ask one question. Will not the gentleman, who is a member of the Committee on Ways and Means, come right down and be concrete and precise and tell us what objections there are to Mr. GOOD's amendment?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I am going to, but in the first place I want to state to the gentleman who thinks the members of the Committee on Ways and Means have not been working upon the provisions of this bill that more than six months ago I commenced to work on this excess-profits provision. More than six months ago I went over the English excess-profits tax, and if gentlemen are aware of how many pages there are to the English excess-profits provision, and the complications that are in it, they will know that no man can talk intelligently about that system unless he has expended weeks in the study of it. I went over that system and found it so complicated that after I had been working upon it for several weeks I had an expert prepare for me a chart setting forth the principal provisions of the system, and after this expert had set out these details in this manner, upon this large sheet which I show you, I will defy any gentleman in the House to correctly understand the workings of the English excess-profits system unless he spends a week upon it, and it is made as plain as it possibly could be. Gentlemen come in here and talk about the Ways and Means Committee not having considered these things. They have gone over the matter months and months, and put in tireless labor upon it. Whether we have succeeded or not is another question.

Mr. HELVERING. After the English system had been adopted and the Canadian Government undertook to levy an excess-profits tax, did they follow the English system?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. No; they rejected it; and if gentlemen of the House will take the trouble to go through the financial journals of the English Government, as I have, they will find there has been all sorts of complaint and trouble with reference to the workings of the English excess-profits system. I was in favor of this system myself at first. It looked well at a glance, and as gentlemen glance over it, as my colleague has, they may want to prepare an amendment such as his; but if his amendment should be adopted he has no more got the English system of excess-profits tax than we have the English system of government. The elaborate provisions which were made necessary by the vital principle of the bill, the principle that they will assess the profits by an estimate upon the first three years prior to the war necessitated all sorts of provisions and regulations, boards, and tribunals in order that more harm might not be done by the act than good could possibly come out of it. One thing that the gentleman has not provided for at all, and it is only one out of a great number not provided for in his amendment, is——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I shall not object, but I should like to have five minutes on the other side.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The gentleman has already used 10 minutes on the other side.

Mr. MONDELL. But not upon this amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that debate has been exhausted upon this amendment.

Mr. MONDELL. If debate has been exhausted, then the gentleman's request is not in order.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. That is what makes my request necessary.

Mr. MONDELL. I certainly do not object to the gentleman going on for five minutes, but I should like to have five minutes on the other side.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I would like to offer an amendment to the proposition of the gentleman from Iowa.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has a right to do that when the gentleman from Iowa has finished. Is there objection to the gentleman's request that he be permitted to proceed for five minutes?

There was no objection.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Now, there is no provision in his amendment for a case where the corporation or partnership that has been assessed was not in business at all before the time of the war. There is no provision in it with reference to a case where the profits of the corporation have been merely nominal before the war, nor where they actually consisted of a loss before the war, nor where there has been a change of ownership, nor for a case where the three years before the war have been years of abnormal depression, nor except in the judgment of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue for changes in capital, nor for a case where the capital has only just commenced to be remunerative. Neither does it include individuals engaged in trade or business—except farming—as the English act does. I could go on here for half an hour if I had the time following the terms of the English excess-profits tax and show the hardships a provision of this kind would work if we undertook to put it in force in this manner. If the gentleman had offered the whole of the English excess-profits tax, which comprises some 20 pages of closely printed matter, he would have found all these matters fully covered and some provision made for them, and that finally the act winds up by providing for boards and tribunals to take into consideration the hardships which were involved under the workings of the excess-profits act. That is the situation, gentlemen, with reference to this amendment which has been offered.

Gentlemen have assumed in some kind of a way that the Committee on Ways and Means did not consider this matter beforehand. Every member of the Committee on Ways and Means had a copy not only of the English excess-profits act but of all the other government excess-profits acts of any country and studied them before this provision was inserted in the bill. It is true some gentlemen on the committee thought that possibly we could substitute this whole English excess-profits act and all of its numerous provisions to which I have referred and that it may be better than the present system we have, but what valid objection is there to this excess-profits tax as it stands?

Mr. IGOE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I will.

Mr. IGOE. Does the gentleman favor the principle that applies a heavier tax upon abnormal profits that are made during the war?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes. As far as the rates are concerned, I would be glad to see them higher.

Mr. IGOE. Why did not the committee put a tax of 16 per cent upon all profits? Was it not possible to work out some scheme, as suggested by the gentleman from Iowa, where this excess profits might be taxed especially during this war?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. My friend, there is 12½ per cent of munitions tax, and 16 per cent on all other profits above 8 per cent.

Mr. IGOE. Who is going to pay the munitions tax? That is the most ridiculous tax to me at this time I ever have heard of. The Government has to pay all of it——

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Well, I will say to the gentleman——

Mr. IGOE. Whether we supply the allies or ourselves we have to pay the tax. To me it is the most senseless tax I ever heard of.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The gentleman is arguing against his own proposition. If the gentleman wants to strike at these conditions——

Mr. IGOE. I want to reach some of the coal companies out in my country who are going to take a profit out of the poor people of St. Louis.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. This excess-profits tax will apply to all the excess profits of this country, created by this abnormal condition that has been brought about by the war, coal companies as well as others. The present excess-profits tax does reach them, but it is nominal on small profits above 10 per cent.

Mr. GOOD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I will.

Mr. GOOD. I called attention to the ownership of some watered stock in a coal company by a man in my State whom I know very well on which he is now receiving over $2,000 a week, which will amount to over $108,000 a year. How much will this bill collect from that profit, to which he is hardly entitled to a cent?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. This bill will collect from that gentleman an income tax, a corporation tax, an excess-profits tax; in all, about 75 per cent of his income. That is an answer to it. I think I have been fairly radical in regard to some things, and some gentlemen thought I had been likely to run away in the direction of high rates upon incomes.

Mr. GOOD. The gentleman thinks he ought to keep $25,000 profits of this watered stock that never was worth a dollar, and which is created solely because of the condition brought about by the war?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Oh, he would have to pay a tax on this profit just the same whether it was watered stock or not. That is perfectly obvious to everybody. He would have to pay the tax on his original investment and would be allowed no deduction for his watered stock.

Mr. KITCHIN. If the gentleman will allow, I would say that the effort was to write the provision so that there could not be any water; that the water was all squeezed out by good will, trade-mark, and so forth.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. KITCHIN. The gentleman should include also that we tax these munition makers 12½ per cent extra dividends and profits in addition to the income tax, the excess-profits tax under the present law and under this law, and also in addition to the corporation tax they pay 12½ per cent more than any other corporation or partnership.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The gentleman is entirely correct. I was about to say the excess-profits tax as levied by this bill will bear very lightly where the profits run up only to 10 or even 20 per cent. If a corporation had a capital of $100,000 and made $20,000, he would pay a little over 1 per cent on his capital through the excess-profits tax; but when the profit was high, then this tax begins to strike quite heavily. Let me also call the attention of the committee to the fact that the amendment offered by my colleague [Mr. GOOD] would permit the Standard Oil Co., which made 200 per cent before the war, to pay nothing if they made 200 per cent after the war, and if they made more, only on what they made over 200 per cent. If some one had offered an amendment including individuals engaged in trade or business as the English tax does, for my part I would have to say that I approve it.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I wish to offer a committee amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman from North Carolina that there is already a committee amendment pending.

Mr. KITCHIN. I ask unanimous consent to do so. There will be no objection to putting that in, because we have passed the section anyway. I ask unanimous consent to consider this now.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to consider the amendment which he has offered now and which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment: On page 6, line 25, after the word "act" and the period, insert the following:

"Income derived from dividends upon stock of other corporations or partnerships which are subject to the tax imposed by this title and Title II of such act of March 3, 1917, shall be exempt from the tax imposed by this title and the tax imposed by Title II of such act of March 3, 1917."

Mr. KITCHIN. You will see in the bill, on page 8, lines 19 to 22, there is the same provision. I did not think it was necessary to offer this amendment, but the committee thought, to make it clear, we had best put it in that place, and therefore I offer it here.

Mr. McCORMICK. Is this intended to dull the shears to the shorn lamb?

Mr. KITCHIN. Just a little.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Is the gentleman against the amendment?

Mr. MONDELL. I am not against the amendment, but I desire to have five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN].

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that I may have five minutes for discussion of the amendment.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, but not intending to object, but to ask for information, when does the time expire?

The CHAIRMAN. There are six minutes remaining.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BORLAND. Is it proper at this time to offer a substitute to the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD]?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. If the gentleman from North Carolina will permit, in the time of the gentleman from Montana I would like to yield to the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. ZIHLMAN], who has a question to ask.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. I would like to ask the chairman of the committee a question as to the provision which prohibits corporations or partnerships from including their trade-marks and trade brands in their capitalization, providing they do not pay for their trade-marks in actual cash, which, in my mind, discriminates——

Mr. KITCHIN. Or other tangible property.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Or other tangible property, but which allows a corporation which pays cash for that trade-mark to put that in their assets. What I want to know is, is the committee uncompromisingly wedded to this proposition?

Mr. KITCHIN. I think it ought to stay in like that. It is to squeeze the water out of these corporations that will want to have a deduction on water and not on actual stuff they put in.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Would not this have a tendency to cause corporations to capitalize at a much larger sum?

Mr. KITCHIN. That is put in to keep them from doing that.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I wanted to say to the gentleman, following the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. ZIHLMAN], that a number of inquiries have been made along this line, and I would like the gentleman to state whether any other amendments would be allowed on this in the committee?

Mr. KITCHIN. I do not think so.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] is recognized.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN], a member of the committee, attempts to answer the argument in behalf of the amendment offered by his colleague [Mr. GOOD] by saying that the English system is complex and that he had difficulty in applying it to our situation.

Now, his colleague has shown the House how easy it is for a Yankee to take the basic principle of the English law and write his provisions in a brief paragraph not complicated and easy of execution. The fact is the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD] should take the place of the present excess-profits law and the excess-profits tax in this bill, because while our present law is rather illogical and not entirely equitable, the proposition of the gentleman from Iowa is logical and equitable. There should be no war tax on normal profits. We reach normal profits through the income tax, and the only war tax that should be placed on profits is a war tax on abnormal, unusual, excessive profits, and that is what this amendment proposes to do. It would lay no tax at all on a profit that was entirely normal and usual—usual to the business. It would lay no tax on any profit less than 10 per cent, but above the normal and above 10 per cent it would do what the English law does—lay a heavy tax for the purpose of reaching those who are making abnormal profits out of the war.

Now, we may assemble grand juries, we may indict men for making combinations in restraint of trade, for making agreements under which prices are boosted, but, judging by past experience, we will not get very far that way; but if we make it very clear that any man who secures an abnormal, unusual, and exorbitant profit shall be heavily taxed on that profit, we will reach the questions of the high cost of living and of abnormal profits of dealers, speculators, and middlemen of one kind and another more effectively than they can be reached in any other way.

Mr. McCORMICK. I thought the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] might be interested to refer to the figures that the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BLAND] gave the House the other day. In 1913 the earnings of the Atlas Powder Co. were a little less than $325,000, whereas in 1916 they were approximately $3,000,000.

Mr. MONDELL. I thank the gentleman. And it is not only powder companies.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. I am sorry. I have but a moment.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I think the gentleman ought to yield to me.

Mr. MONDELL. There are various sorts of corporations making unusual and abnormal profits out of the war situation. Whether they are doing so under conditions in restraint of trade I do not know. Evidently the Attorney General does not know. He has not been able to find out. No one has been punished for that sort of thing. But we all know that the prices of the necessities of life have advanced steadily day by day, and some people are making enormous and abnormal profits out of those rises in price.

Those are the classes of profits that ought to be reached, and they are not the classes of profits that are reached by any of the provisions of this bill. The excess profits tax, so called, in this bill is not an excess profits tax at all. It is simply a plain, ordinary, everyday direct profits tax. A profits tax should be a tax on excess profits, unusual and abnormal profits.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wyoming has expired.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GOOD. My colleage [Mr. GREEN] stated a moment ago that not 1 per cent of the membership of the House had read the English excess profits law, and he added that if I could prove that they had he would give a dinner to the House. A little later a member of the Committee on Ways and Means said that the committee had a copy of it and that they had read it. Now, there are 23 members of that committee. The inquiry I propound now is whether or not it would be in order for the gentleman to extend his invitation? [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. That is not a parliamentary inquiry. [Laughter.]

Mr. CANNON. I hope when this dinner question is settled it will include all of us. [Laughter.]

Mr. IGOE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. KITCHIN. I hope no more unanimous consents will be asked upon this. We have now run behind 10 minutes.

Mr. IGOE. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me the question at this time is not whether or not the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa is perfect in every detail, but whether or not the House wants to go on record in favor of the principle involved.

The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN] says we have taken care of ammunition plants by some sort of munition tax. There are a great many concerns in this country making money out of the war situation besides the munition companies. Out in my section of the country they are very much alarmed now about the supply of coal, and they will be more alarmed when the winter comes unless something is done to that situation. Some say it is due to a shortage of coal cars. Some of the newspapers out there undertook to interview some of the men who have these coal mines, and here is a sentence by one of them which shows the spirit that animates them. I read:

I have been in the coal business 30 years, and in the next 5 years I expect to make some money. For several years the operators have lost money. Now they have a chance to recoup.

That is not only true of the men who own the coal mines but of the men who own other things, and some who have made money in the past want to make still more money now.

If the public-utility concerns want to make enormous or abnormal profits, the public-service commissions regulate them. I do not suppose the Congress will follow that principle at this time, but I can not see why men operating coal mines and dealing in other absolute necessities during this war should not be curbed as to abnormal profits on much the same principle as public utilities are regulated in times of peace; and if the war lasts very long I think you will have to come to the point of adopting the suggestion made by the owner of that plant who wrote to the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. NEELY] that while he was the owner of one of the largest institutions of its kind in this country and could make greater profits he was willing to surrender, during the war, all over a reasonable profit to the Government. I believe that we must do something either in the way of taxation or regulation, and I think we ought to approve now the principle of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa, and I for one shall vote for it. [Applause and cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer a substitute.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri offers a substitute for the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa.

The Clerk read as follows:

Substitute offered by Mr. BORLAND: Insert:

"SEC. 202. That for the purposes of this act invested capital shall be computed in accordance with the provisions of section 402 of the act approved September 8, 1916."

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, all debate on this title has been exhausted and 10 minutes over.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that according to his count there are 16 minutes remaining.

Mr. KITCHIN. I think the Chair is in error.

The CHAIRMAN. The reason the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. IGOE] asked unanimous consent was because the debate had been exhausted on the amendment.

Mr. KITCHIN. I think we have been on this about two hours; over an hour and a half, anyway.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman keeping time here informs the Chair that there are 16 minutes remaining.

Mr. KITCHIN. We voted on the other proposition at 12.15. Now it is a quarter to 3.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, I am not going to ask for an extension of time, because I explained this item a few moments ago. But I want to explain the present form of my amendment. I explained heretofore where the lame provision was regarding the valuation of the property of these corporations. It was objected that if my plan were adopted, providing for the valuation of the property at the beginning of the fiscal year, it would require a great deal of work and machinery in order to ascertain that. This is not the case. Less work would be required, less expense to the Government, and better results.

But we made the proposition in this form in order to show how little there was in that objection. On September 8, 1916, we passed this act providing for a tax on the earnings of joint-stock companies and corporations, and as a part of that provision section 407 itself provided that the amount of the annual tax shall in all cases be computed on the basis of the fair average value of the capital stock for the preceding year. Now, gentlemen would think that was a difficult thing to get at. It is just as difficult as my proposition—no more and no less—the fair value of the capital stock for the preceding year. Yet the Secretary of the Treasury has to-day under that law in his office the exact data of the fair annual value of the capital stock of every corporation subject to the tax. Then it simply results in this——

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BORLAND. In just a minute I will; yes. It simply results in this, that this proposition is much more simple, much more practical, and is much less work than the proposition now in the law, because the proposition now in the law requires you to go back 10, 20, or 30 years to find out the value of the property at the time it was paid into the corporation. This requires you to use statistics now on file in the office of the Secretary of the Treasury. There can not be the slightest objection to it. It eliminates not only the objection of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN], but it actually reduces the machinery necessary for the enforcement of this law. Now I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] for a short question. I have only five minutes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Can the gentleman inform the committee what process the Internal-Revenue Division follows in determining the fair valuation of the capital stock?

Mr. BORLAND. I could, and I will in a minute if I have time; but I want to speak to another point. The gentleman can find it out from the reports——

Mr. STAFFORD. I know how it is done. Where there have been no sales of stock made within the year they take the estimated value of the stock based upon its earning capacity for the last five years.

Mr. BORLAND. If the gentleman knows I will not stop to explain it. I know, and so does he.

Under the present workings of the law if a southern pine lumber company has timberland for which it paid $5 an acre 20 years ago, and it has 100,000 acres, so that under the present law it would be valued at $500,000, if it sells half of that timberland for $40 or $50 an acre the corporation to which it sells is entitled to an 8 per cent profit on $40 or $50 an acre; but the original corporation, that has paid the taxes on that timberland for 30 years, is only entitled to make 8 per cent on the $5 an acre. Now, that is an actual case, and that is a proposition which should be corrected by reference to this law.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I can not understand the process of reasoning and the logic of the gentleman from Missouri. He wants now to make invested capital mean the par value of the capital stock, and he says that now under the present law the Secretary of the Treasury must value the assets of a company in order to find out the value of the capital stock. The Secretary of the Treasury does not have to do any such thing. The present law provides for a tax on corporations of 50 cents for each $1,000 of the fair value of the capital stock, and in estimating the value of capital stock the surplus and undivided profits shall be included. Here is the United States Steel Corporation. The only thing the Secretary of Treasury has to do is to find its market value, and the same is true with reference to the Bethlehem Co. Here is some other company that has no market value in the sense of the Bethlehem Co. or the United States Steel Corporation, which are quoted daily on the stock market. Say it is a bank, for instance. They go to the bank and find out the value of the capital stock. If the bank has sold any shares they find out what they sold for. If the bank did not have any sales that year they can find out how much the surplus and undivided profits amount to. They would not have to go into the assets or the valuation of the real estate or anything about it, but just what the capital stock is worth.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield in that particular? I will say for the information of the gentleman that where there have been no sales of stock made within the year, so that the department has to ascertain the fair value of the shares of stock, they merely take the estimated value of that stock, based upon the earning capacity of the stock for the last five years.

Mr. KITCHIN. Certainly. I hope the amendment of the gentleman from Missouri will not be adopted.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Debate has been exhausted on the substitute.

Mr. COX. I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. KITCHIN. All debate has been exhausted.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I wish to submit a parliamentary inquiry. The Chairman stated that there were 18 minutes remaining.

The CHAIRMAN. About 18 minutes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Now, may I ask if there was deducted from the hour and a half that was agreed upon the time that was later allowed by unanimous consent?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Now, I want to submit to the Chair that that is incorrect. The agreement of the Committee of the Whole was that debate should be concluded in an hour and a half, and any request for unanimous consent that was made during that time should not come out of the hour and a half unless it was clearly understood at the time that it was to be taken out of the hour and a half.

The CHAIRMAN. As the Chair understood the question and put it to the committee—he thinks the gentleman from Illinois will bear him out in this—there was to be one hour and a half debate, not the reading of amendments or voting on amendments, but one hour and a half of debate.

Mr. MANN. That was undoubtedly correct.

The CHAIRMAN. But an actual debate of 1 hour and 30 minutes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I understood the Chair to state, however, that certain time had been taken out of the hour and a half.

The CHAIRMAN. All the debate that has been had has been taken out of the hour and a half.

Mr. KITCHIN. All debate is now exhausted.

Mr. MANN. We are occupying several minutes now, which, of course, do not come out of the hour and a half.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. The question is whether only the time used in reading amendments had been excluded from the hour and a half.

The CHAIRMAN. All the time except what has been actually used in debate has been excluded. The Chair understood, and so stated at the time, that there was to be an hour and a half of actual debate, not counting the time for the reading of amendments or voting upon them as the different amendments came up.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry. Has debate been exhausted on the pending substitute?

The CHAIRMAN. It has, for and against.

Mr. COX. Then I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. KITCHIN. All the time has been exhausted on this.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana moves to amend the substitute by striking out the last word.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, how much time does remain?

The CHAIRMAN. Ten minutes.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, I want to oppose the substitute offered by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND], but I want earnestly to support the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD].

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. COX. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Does my friend understand that under the amendment offered by my colleague, Mr. GOOD, that if John D. Rockefeller made 100 per cent before the war and makes 100 per cent now he will not pay any tax; that if he makes 125 per cent he will only be taxed on the extra 25 per cent?

Mr. COX. Oh, there is but one John D. Rockefeller in the United States, but there are thousands of multimillionaires in this country making millions every year in war profits. I hold no brief to defend John D. Rockefeller any more than I hold a brief to defend anybody else.

Mr. GOOD. This does not detract from any other taxation.

Mr. COX. My good friend from Iowa, Judge GREEN, for whom I have the profoundest respect for his ability, sincerity, and honesty of purpose, consumed 10 minutes in opposition to the amendment offered by Mr. GOOD on the floor of the House. I asked him specifically to point out what objection there was to the Good amendment, and the sum and substance of his objections was that it was framed in the fashion of the English system and that the English system was cumbrous and hard to administer. And yet when you come to read the Good amendment it is plain, concise, concrete, and any schoolboy could understand it and any bureau of the Government could easily administer it.

I am going to vote for any measure that will raise all the money that is needed to finance this war. Where shall we look to get that money? Shall we look to the graveyards, to the poorhouses, and the almshouses of the Nation? Shall we look to the millions of men and women in this country to-day who are up against the bread line? Shall we look to that class of men and women who are earning from $1.50 to $3 a day and paying 10 cents a loaf for bread and 40 and 50 cents a pound for bacon? And yet this bill reported in here by the great Ways and Means Committee proposes to tax everything that the poor people use and consume. Here we propose in this bill to increase the rate of duty by 10 per cent upon all the dutiable list, the things that come in here now subject to duty. We propose to add an additional 10 per cent upon all goods that come in here now on the free list. According to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY], one of the best experts on his side of the House, it makes the highest tariff this country ever had, and naturally will increase the cost of living to the poor people. "Do not touch the big, rich man, that will not do; you will disturb and disjoint business. Do not disturb great, abnormal war profits; these men that are making millions of dollars every year out of this war." I presume the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD] will insert the table in the RECORD, and I hope he will. There are 42 of those corporations, according to the list submitted to the House. In 1913 these 42 corporations had an income of $204,000,000. In 1916 the same corporations had a net income of $729,000,000. Now, what does the Good amendment propose to do? It proposes to add a tax over and above the normal 8 per cent tax of 30 per cent. That is all it does. It simply proposes to reach out and to take the 30 per cent of that abnormal profit. The amendment ought to prevail. [Applause.]

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I just want a minute or two to offer a suggestion, and then I will not take any further time. I think that the outstanding wonder of this war is the manner in which Great Britain has financed it. The most awful burden financially that any nation has ever suffered, and yet we are told that she has thus far financed the war without any great disturbance in the industrial situation of Great Britain. In looking into the items by which she did it I notice that the income-tax rate—the minimum is 7½ per cent and the maximum 42½ per cent. The minimum exemption is $650, the maximum, the figures beyond which the rate does not go above 42½ per cent, is $50,000. Last year she raised on that basis $1,020,000,000. She also raised last year upon the excess profits tax $700,000,000, and she did it without laying a tax on excess profits on the general business of the country, as we propose to do in this present measure, but confined it very largely to these businesses that are making a profit out of the war. She reaches this character of profits by taking the average profits of a business any two out of the three preceding years before the war and compares them with the profits of the pending year.

In November, 1915, she put a tax of 50 per cent and in April, 1916, of 60 per cent, and this year she has raised it to 80 per cent, and still we are told by English financiers and statesmen that there is not any material interruption in the business integrity of the country, such as would be expected to result from the great catastrophe.

Now, if that result can be reached by refusing to put an excess profits tax on all the businesses of the country, but rather confine it to a high rate on these businesses making great profits out of the war, as in England, it seems to me it is equitable, it is just, and I do not think that it is an unwise discrimination because of the great emergency. And if the committee is not ready to make some such recommendation in the light of what England has accomplished under the great stress of the world war, to rewrite this particular provision which puts 16 per cent on all businesses, whether augmented profits from war or other reasons, rather than to fix the high per cent on those businesses prospering from the war, then I frankly say I am ready to vote to recommit the bill—send it back to the committee with instructions to bring it in with this war excess profits provision thoroughly worked out. It is a source of great revenue without great disturbance at a time of great emergency.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. Yes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Does the gentleman understand that our excess profits tax taxes any more business than England's excess profits tax?

Mr. FESS. As I read it; yes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Our exemptions are much larger.

Mr. FESS. The difference between your bill and the English system is you tax everything without regard to source, and the English system taxes those industries which most largely make their profits out of the war.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The gentleman has got it exactly wrong.

The CHAIRMAN. The first question is on the substitute offered by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND].

Mr. BURNETT. Can we have the amendment and substitute read?

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will again read the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa and the substitute offered by the gentleman from Missouri.

The amendment and the substitute were again read.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the substitute offered by the gentleman from Missouri for the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa.

The question was taken, and the substitute was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. GOOD) there were 52 ayes and 103 noes.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Chairman, as I understand it, we have now reached Title III?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that this title, which has reference to beverages, be now read, and that all debate upon the title and all amendments thereto close at 3.30 o'clock.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that Title III be read and that debate upon the title and all amendments thereto close at 3.30 o'clock. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I shall object to fixing a specific hour for closing debate, when half of that time would be used in reading the bill.

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Chairman, I would suggest 3.15 o'clock.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman desires to suggest a time for debate, that might be very well; but I object to fixing it at a specific hour, when most of the time allowed will be taken up in reading the title.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I would like to know whether or not the committee has any amendments to offer to this title?

Mr. RAINEY. There are one or two minor amendments to be offered by the committee.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Are there any affecting the rates?

Mr. RAINEY. No.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Illinois objects, because the gentleman does not fix a specific time for debate instead of fixing a time to close.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I am not willing to fix a specific hour when debate shall be closed, when no one knows how that time will be used. It might be used in arguing a point of order or in a parliamentary inquiry or in the bill.

Mr. RAINEY. Then I shall modify my request. What time would the gentleman suggest?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I have not heard of anyone who desires to offer an amendment on the floor.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, it is probable that I shall offer an amendment, a very important one.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I would suggest an hour.

Mr. MANN. Let the gentleman make his request to read the title through, when it shall be subject to amendment.

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the title be read through and be then subject to amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

TITLE III.—WAR TAX ON BEVERAGES.

SEC. 300. That on and after the passage of this act there shall be levied and collected on all distilled spirits in bond at that time or that have been or that may be then or thereafter produced in or imported into the United States, except such distilled spirits as are subject to the tax provided in section 301, in addition to the tax now imposed by law, a tax of $1.10 on each proof gallon, or wine gallon when below proof, and a proportionate tax at a like rate on all fractional parts of such proof or wine gallon, to be paid by the distiller and imposed and collected under the provisions of existing law.

SEC. 301. That upon all distilled spirits produced in or imported into the United States upon which the tax now imposed by law has been paid, and which, on the day this act is passed, are held by a retailer in a quantity in excess of 50 gallons in the aggregate, or by any other person, corporation, parnership, or association in any quantity, and are intended for sale, there shall be levied, assessed, collected, and paid a tax of $1.10 on each proof gallon, or wine gallon when below proof, and a proportionate tax at a like rate on all fractional parts of such proof or wine gallon.

SEC. 302. That in addition to the tax now imposed or imposed by this act on distilled spirits there shall be levied, assessed, collected, and paid a tax of 15 cents on each wine gallon and a proportionate tax at a like rate on all fractional parts of such wine gallon on all distilled spirits or wines hereafter rectified, purified, or refined in such manner, and on all mixtures hereafter produced in such manner, that the person so rectifying, purifying, refining, or mixing the same is a rectifier within the meaning of section 3204, Revised Statutes, as amended, and on all such articles in the possession of the rectifier on the day this act is passed.

When the process of rectification is completed and the tax prescribed by this section has been paid, it shall be unlawful for the rectifier or other dealer to reduce in proof or increase in volume such spirits or wine by the addition of water or other substance; nothing herein contained shall, however, prevent a rectifier from using again in the process of rectification spirits already rectified and upon which the tax has theretofore been paid.

The tax imposed by this section shall not attach to cordials or liqueurs on which a tax is imposed and paid under the act entitled "An act to increase the revenue, and for other purposes," approved September 8, 1916, nor to blends of pure wines, where such blending is for the sole purpose of perfecting such wines according to commercial standards, nor to blends of two or more pure straight whiskies aged in wood for a period not less than four years and without the addition of coloring or flavoring matter or any other substance than pure water and if not reduced below 90 proof: Provided, That such blended whiskies shall be exempt from tax under this section only when compounded under the immediate supervision of a revenue officer, in such tanks and under such conditions and supervision as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, may prescribe.

All distilled spirits taxable under this title shall be subject to uniform regulations concerning the use thereof in the manufacture, blending, compounding, mixing, marking, branding, and sale of whisky and rectified spirits, and no discrimination whatsoever shall be made by reason of a difference in the character of the material from which same may have been produced.

The business of a rectifier of spirits shall be carried on, and the tax on rectified spirits shall be paid under such rules, regulations, and bonds as may be prescribed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury.

Any person violating any of the provisions of this section shall be deemed to be guilty of a misdemeanor and, upon conviction, shall be fined not less than $500 and imprisoned not more than two years. He shall, in addition, be liable to double the tax evaded, the same to be recovered, together with the tax, on any bond given by him as rectifier.

SEC. 303. That on and after the passage of this act there shall be levied and collected on all beer, lager beer, ale, porter, and other similar fermented liquor, containing one-half per cent or more of alcohol, brewed or manufactured and sold, or stored in warehouse, or removed for consumption or sale, within the United States, by whatever name such liquors may be called, in addition to the tax now imposed by law, a tax of $1.25 for every barrel containing not more than 31 gallons, and at a like rate for any other quantity or for the fractional parts of a barrel authorized and defined by law.

SEC. 304. That upon all still wines, including vermuth, and upon all champagne and other sparkling wines, liqueurs, cordials, artificial or imitation wines or compounds sold as wine, except wines containing not more than 14 per cent of absolute alcohol, hereafter produced in or imported into the United States, and removed from the customhouse, place of manufacture, or from bonded premises for sale or consumption, there shall be levied and collected, in addition to the tax now imposed by law upon such articles, a tax equal to such tax, to be levied, collected, and paid under the provisions of existing law. Upon wines containing not more than 14 per cent of absolute alcohol there shall be levied and collected in addition to the tax now imposed by law upon such wines, a tax equal to one-half such tax, to be levied, collected, and paid under the provisions of existing law, and the tax imposed by existing law and the additional tax herein imposed shall apply to all domestic or imported liqueurs, cordials, or similar compounds by whatever name sold or offered for sale and without reference to the kind of spirits or wines used in the manufacture thereof.

SEC. 305. That upon all articles specified in section 304 upon which the tax now imposed by law has been paid and which are on the day this act is passed held in excess of 25 gallons in the aggregate of such articles and intended for sale, there shall be levied, collected, and paid a tax equal to the tax now imposed by law.

SEC. 306. That upon all grape brandy or wine spirits withdrawn by a producer of wines from any fruit distillery or special bonded warehouse under subdivision (c) of section 402 of the act entitled "An act to increase the revenue, and for other purposes," approved September 8, 1916, there shall be levied, assessed, collected, and paid in addition to the tax therein imposed, a tax equal to such tax, to be assessed, collected, and paid under the provisions of existing law.

SEC. 307. Upon all sweet wines held for sale by the producer thereof upon the day this act is passed there shall be levied, assessed, collected, and paid an additional tax equivalent to 10 cents per proof gallon upon the grape brandy or wine spirits used in the fortification of such wine, and an additional tax of 10 cents per proof gallon shall be levied, assessed, collected, and paid upon all grape brandy or wine spirits withdrawn by a producer of sweet wines for the purpose of fortifying such wines and not so used prior to the passage of this act.

SEC. 308. That there shall be levied, assessed, collected, and paid—

(a) Upon all prepared sirups or extracts (intended for use in the manufacture or production of beverages, commonly known as soft drinks, by soda fountains, bottling establishments, and other similar places) sold by the manufacturer, producer, or importer thereof, a tax equivalent to 10 per cent of the price for which so sold; and

(b) Upon all unfermented grape juice, artificial mineral waters (not carbonated), and fermented liquors containing less than one-half per cent of alcohol, sold by the manufacturer, producer, or importer thereof in bottles or other closed containers, and upon all ginger ale, root beer, sarsaparilla, pop, and other carbonated waters or beverages, manufactured and sold by the manufacturer, producer, or importer of the carbonic-acid gas used in carbonating the same, a tax of 2 cents per gallon; and

(c) Upon all natural mineral waters or table waters, sold by the producer, bottler, or importer thereof, in bottles or other closed containers, at over 10 cents per gallon, a tax of 1 cent per gallon; and

(d) Upon all carbonic-acid gas in drums or other containers (intended for use in the manufacture or production of carbonated water or drinks) sold by the manufacturer, producer, or importer thereof, a tax of 8 cents per pound.

SEC. 309. That each such manufacturer, producer, bottler, or importer shall make monthly returns under oath to the collector of internal revenue for the district in which is located the principal place of business, containing such information necessary for the assessment of the tax, and at such times and in such manner as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, may by regulation prescribe.

Mr. RAINEY. I desire now to ask unanimous consent that all debate upon this title and all amendments thereto close at 4 o'clock.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman make the proposal an hour?

Mr. RAINEY. In one hour.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that all debate upon this title and all amendments thereto close in one hour. Is there objection?

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman whether this concludes debate on all the amendments that will be offered to this?

Mr. RAINEY. Yes.

Mr. HOWARD. Will those of us who desire to offer amendments have an opportunity to get time?

Mr. RAINEY. If you offer them before the expiration of the hour and get recognition from the Chair.

Mr. HOWARD. I have two amendments that I desire to offer, I think they are important.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize the gentleman.

Mr. HOWARD. I wish the gentleman would make it 4 o'clock.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, does the gentleman mean that this one hour for debate shall include the time consumed in reading amendments?

Mr. RAINEY. No.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands that this is to be one hour of debate, not for offering amendments or voting. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I did not hear the request.

The CHAIRMAN. The request is that there shall be one hour of debate on this title and all amendments thereto.

Mr. MANN. Will that give gentlemen an opportunity to offer amendments or to move to strike out the title if they desire?

The CHAIRMAN. Certainly, but it applies only to debate, not to the time consumed in voting or in making motions. Is there objection?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I believe it will be better that this debate progress for a while, at least, before there is any motion made to close debate, because we can not now foresee what the amendments may be, and to what extent it may be necessary to debate them. I would be glad if the gentleman would withhold his request for the present.

Mr. RAINEY. Very well, I withhold the request for the present.

Mr. Chairman, I offer the following committee amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment: Page 10, line 20, after the word "to," strike out the words "blends of pure" and insert in lieu thereof the following: "the mixing and blending of."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 10, line 23, after the word "blends" insert the words "made exclusively."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 11, line 8, strike out the word "title" and insert in lieu thereof the word "section."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following committee amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 14, line 16, before the word "artificial" insert the words "soft drinks or."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word in order to ask the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY] if it has been agreed by the committee at a later point in the bill to offer an amendment that will provide a time within which those who have liquors, tobaccos, and so forth, now stored may pay; that is, fix a date as late as September 15?

Mr. RAINEY. Yes, sir. When we reach section 1102 of the bill the committee have prepared an amendment to submit in that connection.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. And that will cover the taxes provided in section 301?

Mr. RAINEY. Yes, sir.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. MOON: After the word "gallon," on page 9, line 20, insert the following:

"Provided, however, That such liquors in the custody of a court of bankruptcy in an insolvency proceeding at the date of the passage of this act shall be exempt from this tax when the packages containing such are stamped by order of said court, showing in substance the terms of this exception."

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I take it the committee will accept this amendment.

Mr. RAINEY. I will say that the committee has no objection to this amendment. We understand the purpose of it.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Who would affix the stamp?

Mr. MOON. The court will order it done.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. The court would be trying the case between whom; the United States would not be a party to it, would it?

Mr. MOON. I will explain to the gentleman from Kentucky that this section is intended to cover this situation. In a very few cases—the commissioner of internal revenue advises me they are exceedingly few—liquor has been impounded already in Federal courts in bankruptcy proceedings for distribution of the funds when sold among the creditors.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Does this amendment include whiskies in bond?

Mr. MOON. It includes everything in the custody of the court.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Well, if it is in bond—that is the point I am endeavoring to get——

Mr. MOON. It includes everything in a bankruptcy case.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. If the whisky is in bond it is in the custody of the court and can not be sold until the tax is paid.

Mr. MOON. I know, but this is an insolvency or bankruptcy case. That is the extent of my amendment. If the gentleman will indulge me for just a moment the reason for it is this: It applies to whisky in the custody of the court at the time of the passage of this act of certain liquors in an insolvency or bankruptcy case; there is no power, of course, in the court to order this tax to be paid upon the liquor. The minor creditors of the insolvent estate, of course, could not raise the money to pay the tax upon this liquor, and the liquor can not be shipped out in a prohibition State before the 1st of July, some of them, and the result is this, that the Government can not get $1 of revenue under this section because there is nobody to pay and the liquor will be destroyed.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. The Government could get it by the sale of the liquor.

Mr. MOON. The liquor would be destroyed the 1st of July in some States; poured under the nuisance act into the gutter. This amendment does not give any revenue to the Government nor take any revenue from the Government, but it will prevent property being confiscated that should go to creditors.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. The gentleman fails to note the point I am endeavoring to make. I am in full accord with the gentleman's amendment, except it does not go far enough.

Mr. MOON. I have no objection to the gentleman offering an amendment to make it go further.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. The bonded warehouse is in the joint custody of the owner of that warehouse and the United States Government. Neither can enter without the other, and whisky in a bonded warehouse is not subject to execution because it can not be reached. Now, if the gentleman will so amend his amendment as to make it the duty of the internal-revenue officer to affix this stamp, then the gentleman will attain the object he is endeavoring to reach, because as it is nobody can go and put a stamp on it.

Mr. MOON. My amendment is intended alone to cover cases in bankruptcy courts where the liquor is in the custody and under the confrol of the court.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. But I am endeavoring to name the person who affixes the stamp; that is all.

Mr. MOON. That is, after the first tax has been paid on it, $1.10——

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. After the tax has been paid it is not in a Government bonded warehouse.

Mr. MOON. Then the gentleman's proposition ought to come as a separate and distinct proposition from this.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I am apprehensive the gentleman's object may fail.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, for the purpose of asking the gentleman from Tennessee a question. I want to call the gentleman's attention to the fact that compositions in bankruptcy may be effected whereby the whisky will be turned back to the control of the owner, and as a result in such case the owner will escape paying this tax. Owners may go into bankruptcy before this bill is passed, and then make a compromise with their creditors and the liquor afterwards be turned back to them and thereby escape this tax.

Mr. MOON. I think not, because this provision shall not apply to anything except liquor in the custody of a court at the time of the passage of the act.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. That is what I am saying.

Mr. MOON. The Internal-Revenue Commissioner says the amount is so small it can not have any effect whatever on the revenue. The composition could scarcely be made between the creditors except under the authority of the court. While the estate is thoroughly insolvent, I take it that no such performance would be had as that which the gentleman anticipates.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. It will turn loose for sale by those who may purchase at a bankruptcy sale certain untaxed liquors, whereas other people will have to pay a tax.

Mr. MOON. It will not do it in the gentleman's State at all, because under the law it can not be shipped into the State.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. It is not a question of my State. It is a question of the proper law to be enacted. It seems to be a question of exempting liquor from this tax.

Mr. MOON. The United States has its courts, and those courts are for the purpose of winding up an insolvent estate. Here is an insolvent estate in the court. The court can not take any action to protect the assets before it as against this tax, because there is nobody that can furnish the money to pay it. The result is, if the property remains under the custody of the courts, under the Federal law, the $1.10 of tax not having been paid, it will be confiscated by the United States; and if not by the United States, under the law of certain States, when it is found within their boundaries after the 1st day of July it will be poured into the gutter.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. This liquor when sold will be worth $1.10 per gallon more than it was before this bill was passed, and the end will be a contribution of $1.10 a gallon by the Federal Government to the creditors or to the bankrupt, if it is turned back to him. In other words, this liquor is going to be worth just as much without paying a tax as it would be if the tax were paid. That is quite evident.

Mr. MOON. It will be worth nothing unless the tax is paid or this amendment passed.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. The value of liquor which is now in custody of a bankruptcy court will be added to by the passage of this bill, to the extent that it levies a tax on that liquor. That is so, because it must be sold in competition with other liquors that have to pay the tax. The persons who buy this liquor will give as much for it when it is exempt as if the tax had been paid, which will mean $1.10 more a gallon. Therefore the Government will contribute to the creditors of a bankrupt or to the bankrupt himself, if the composition should be effected, the amount of $1.10 per gallon on all liquor that is exempted from the tax.

Mr. MOON. It is absolutely absurd to talk about a composition being affected against liquor in custody of the Federal court that must pay a revenue tax. How are you going to raise the $1.10 a gallon upon this liquor in order to enable the court to handle it?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Enough of it can be sold by the court to pay the tax.

Mr. MOON. No such thing as that can be done under existing prohibition laws.

Mr. MANN. I understood the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] to say there was no way of paying the tax.

Mr. MOON. I say the creditors have no way of paying the tax.

Mr. MANN. Suppose the liquor is in the hands of the trustee in bankruptcy, still in bond, is there any way of paying the tax now?

Mr. MOON. If a tax has to be paid, it will have to be paid by the creditors.

Mr. MANN. I do not see any reason——

Mr. MOON. This does not apply to liquor that the $1.10 has not already been paid on.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman said, however, there was no way by which the tax could be paid. Then how is it paid where bankruptcy proceedings relate to liquor which still is in bond upon which the tax has been paid?

Mr. MOON. The trustee will not get possession, as I understand.

Mr. MANN. The trustee, of course, will get possession.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. The law provides explicitly and in plain English that nobody will be recognized toward the tax payment except the distiller.

Mr. MANN. Suppose the distiller goes into bankruptcy, who has possession of his property?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Then the court has possession of it.

Mr. MANN. That is it. The court has, and the court appoints a trustee who has.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Then the trustee can ask for a regauge for the purpose of tax payment.

Mr. MANN. But the trustee has to pay the tax if he takes the liquor. The trustee will have to pay the tax if this law is passed if he disposes of the liquor.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. The point I was endeavoring to make with the gentleman from Tennessee was that nobody could get to the package in the bonded warehouse and issue this stamp unless this act authorized him to do so.

Mr. MANN. I think there will be a way to go and tax the stamp. I do not see any reason why they should be exempt from paying the tax when you add $1.10 to the value of the spirits.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. They should not be exempt.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

If we adopt this amendment it puts a premium on all distillers and whisky dealers prior to the passage of this act to go into bankruptcy so as to evade the payment of this additional tax of $1.10 a gallon.

Mr. MOON. I will say to the gentleman the amendment itself does not propose to affect anything except what is in the custody of the court when this act is passed.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman's statement does not controvert anything that I stated in my premise. It places a premium upon the dealer or distiller, the one or the other, to go into bankruptcy, so that when he is once in bankruptcy the whisky will not be liable to the payment of $1.10 as prescribed by the proposed bill. No provision whatsoever is made after the trustee is authorized to sell this liquor that purchaser shall pay the additional $1.10. The very purpose and effect of the amendment is to relieve the whisky that is in the hands of trustees in bankruptcy at the time of the passage of this act of the payment of $1.10.

I think that is a very profitable inducement open to many owners of distilleries who are trembling for fear that we shall have a dry law enacted before this Congress adjourns, to take advantage of this very liberal amendment and go into bankruptcy so as to avoid the payment of this additional $1.10.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. I will be glad to yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MOON. Then the gentleman's idea is that there ought to be a date fixed in this, so as to avoid what he suggests?

Mr. STAFFORD. Oh, no. I say that there should be a further amendment made to the proposed amendment, so that this whisky, which is now in the hands of the trustee in bankruptcy, at the time it is sold shall pay an additional $1.10. You have no right to relieve the trustee in bankruptcy at the time of the passage of this act, as proposed by the gentleman from Tennessee, of the additional tax of $1.10.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes; I yield to my colleague.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I want to call the gentleman's attention to the fact that persons who are solvent can go into bankruptcy designedly for the purpose of evading this tax.

Mr. STAFFORD. There is no greater bid or inducement for all the liquor dealers, even distillers and wholesalers, who are trembling lest they will be forced out of business, to go into bankruptcy in order to avoid the payment of this $1.10 when the trustee is directed by the order of the court to sell the assets of the estate.

Mr. MEEKER. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I wanted to make this suggestion to the House.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. MEEKER. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MOON. I want to address the committee for a few minutes in my own right. This seems to be a very simple proposition. It does not affect anything except whisky in the possession of the court at the day that this act is passed.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit a question in that connection?

Mr. MOON. Yes.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Will it have the effect of releasing that whisky from the payment of $1.10 that other whisky of like character will have to pay?

Mr. MOON. I will answer that question. Here is a case in a bankruptcy court, a court of the United States, winding up an insolvent estate. It takes into its custody whisky that has paid the tax of $1.10 already. Now, here comes an act that proposes to add another $1.10 to the burden of creditors who are already losing a part of their indebtedness. They are small creditors in this case. It is true, there are few of them. It does not amount to much to the United States, but it amounts to a good deal to these individuals.

Here is the existing condition in reference to it: Here is a prohibition State in which on the 1st day of July every drop of liquor must be poured out. Now, there is nobody to pay this additional $1.10. That being true, the Government will never get the $1.10 if the liquor is poured out, will it?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Will the gentleman pardon an interruption there?

Mr. MOON. In one moment. You will never get the $1.10 additional tax, because the property upon which it is proposed to be levied is, by virtue of the law of the State in which it exists, about to be destroyed, so that if the Government of the United States under no condition can get the tax what is the objection in these small cases to giving to the creditor, who is not getting one-half of his claim any way, the benefit of his exemption?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. The gentleman is proceeding on the assumption that the Government will not get the tax. In that assumption he is greatly mistaken, because there is no condition arising under which the Government can not get the tax. The State authorities can not deprive the United States Government of its superior lien, and the United States lien being a prior one the whisky will be sold wherever it is to pay the Government tax.

Mr. MOON. The Government will have no right to make the sale unless that bankruptcy order is made. That $1.10 tax will not be paid by anybody. Can it be that the Government of the United States will lay its hand for tax on a drop of liquor in a State where the State had decreed solemnly that every drop of such liquor in its borders must be poured into the gutter by a given date unless the State law is set at defiance. It was held, I am advised, in the United States court in Georgia that this could not be done.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. MEEKER. Will the gentleman lend some of his time? The gentleman can certainly loan me a part of his time, because the gentleman from Tennessee has had all my time. [Laughter.]

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I did not get it.

Mr. MEEKER. I want to ask whether or not there can not be a date put in there, say, May 18. I ask that question of the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. MOON. I would have no objection.

Mr. MEEKER. Make it to-day instead of "immediately." That will obviate the difficulty.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. If the gentleman from Missouri will permit, he must not lose sight of the fact that in addition to this $1.10 that goes on, the whisky will be worth $1.10 more, and whoever buys it will buy it at that increased value. I failed to catch the purport of the amendment when it was read at the Clerk's desk, but the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] has correctly interpreted it. It places a lesser tax upon whisky mixed up in bankruptcy proceedings than on whisky in a Government warehouse.

Mr. MEEKER. The changing of that date will correct it.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. No; because there is whisky now involved in bankruptcy proceedings.

Mr. MOON. Does the gentleman know how much it will amount to?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I do not know.

Mr. MOON. It will amount to only a few thousand dollars, all told.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. In my opinion, the gentleman can get $100,000 now for the whisky already in bonded warehouses in my town.

Mr. MOON. I could not sell it after the 1st of July in Tennessee.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Would not the effect of the amendment be that instead of having the Government of the United States receive the benefit of the $1.10 we would transfer that $1.10 to the assets of the bankrupt for the benefit of creditors?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. That is exactly what it means.

Mr. STAFFORD. That is a remarkable principle to be adopted by this Congress.

Mr. HOWARD. When does this additional tax of $1.10 attach to this liquor that is in the hands of a bankruptcy court?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. The day this bill becomes a law.

Mr. HOWARD. Then it is sold, of course, by the trustee——

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. By the trustee, who acts for the creditor——

Mr. HOWARD. With the additional $1.10 tax upon it?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Yes.

Mr. HOWARD. Which, of course, adds $1.10 to the assets of the bankrupt?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. It does.

Mr. HOWARD. That is all right.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi). The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON].

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, let us have a division on that.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee demands a division.

The affirmative vote was taken.

The CHAIRMAN. All opposed to the amendment will rise.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I submit that the proposition ought to be put to the committee, so that they will know what they are voting on.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will put it again.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, before the question is put the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] desires to offer an amendment to my amendment.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, that can not be done. The committee is dividing. A rising vote was asked for. The affirmative vote has been taken and the Chair was engaged in counting the negative vote.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from North Carolina ask unanimous consent to offer his amendment?

Mr. KITCHIN. I ask unanimous consent.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request?

Mr. STAFFORD. Reserving the right to object, let us have the amendment read first.

The CHAIRMAN. Where does the gentleman want this amendment to come in?

Mr. KITCHIN. I want to offer it as a substitute for the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina offers it as a substitute for the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Substitute offered by Mr. KITCHIN:

"Provided, That the tax on such liquors in the custody of a court of bankruptcy in insolvency proceedings at the time of the passage of this act shall be paid by the person to whom the court delivers such liquors at the time of such delivery."

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request for unanimous consent?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I fail to understand that amendment.

Mr. KITCHIN. The tax of $1.10 would be paid when the court delivers the whisky to the purchaser.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I do not know whether the amendment permits the exemption desired by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] or not. If so, it is a very irregular way to take up this matter, I submit to the gentleman. We have already voted, and a division was asked for, and was in progress of being taken.

Mr. KITCHIN. I do not think the gentleman from Alabama understands this question.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I do not; and that is why I think it is improper that it should be offered in this way.

Mr. MANN. This is not a substitute for the Moon amendment, anyhow.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. It purports to be.

Mr. MANN. It is supposed to be an addition to the Moon amendment.

Mr. KITCHIN. No; it is a substitute for the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON].

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. It must be an amendment to it.

Mr. KITCHIN. All it does is this: The gentleman's amendment exempts it from taxation altogether. My amendment does not exempt it altogether, and does not make the court pay the tax at once upon the passage of this act, but the person to whom the court delivers it finally must pay the tax at the time of delivery.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I will say to the gentleman that if it was on free whisky the amendment would be good, but if it is whisky in bond it would not be good, because the Government already has an obligation from the producer of it to pay the tax and has his bond.

Mr. KITCHIN. That whisky referred to in the gentleman's amendment and the whisky referred to in my amendment is the whisky that has already paid the $1.10.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. It does not say that.

Mr. KITCHIN. Oh, yes; it does. It has to be. I understand the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee is to line 20, page 9. It only refers to whisky that has already paid the tax.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, would not the effect of the gentleman's substitute be to put a premium upon persons who are now in bankruptcy, and who happen to have whisky as their asset, to keep it in bankruptcy so as to avoid the payment of the tax? I think that is a matter to be considered.

Mr. MANN. It relates to only retail dealers, anyhow.

Mr. STAFFORD. I think this matter should be thoroughly considered by the Committee on Ways and Means, and I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin objects. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON].

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I will say to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] and the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee makes no distinction whatever between tax-paid whisky and whisky yet in bond.

Mr. MANN. This section relates to only whisky in the hands of a retail dealer.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] does not say that.

Mr. MANN. No; but it only relates to this section.

Mr. ROBBINS. This does not refer to the distiller at all.

Mr. KITCHIN. It refers to all distilled spirits, whether in the hands of the retailer or in the hands of the wholesaler.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Or any other person.

Mr. KITCHIN. Or any other person, upon which the distilled-spirits tax has already been paid.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I think the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] is mistaken on that.

Mr. MANN. Section 301 says:

And which, on the day this act is passed, are held by a retailer——

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes—

in a quantity in excess of 50 gallons in the aggregate, or by any other person, corporation, partnership, or association in any quantity, and are intended for sale, there shall be levied, assessed, collected, and paid a tax of $1.10 on each proof gallon, or wine gallon when below proof, and a proportionate tax at a like rate on all fractional parts of such proof or wine gallon.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. But still it is my opinion that there is no distinction made between tax-paid whisky and whisky in bond.

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes; section 301 says:

That upon all distilled spirits produced in or imported into the United States upon which the tax now imposed by law has been paid, and which on the day this act is passed are held by a retailer.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Yes; but the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee says all liquors.

Mr. MOON. All such liquors.

Mr. KITCHIN. That is, distilled spirits, referred to in section 301; that on all such distilled spirits in the hands of a court the tax shall be paid by the person to whom the court delivers the liquors at the time it delivers them, and this is in order to avoid the payment of taxes on liquor in the hands of the court. The Government it not going to pay that tax. It is going to pass it on to the person to whom the liquor is delivered.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I will say that I shall have no objection to the amendment of the gentleman from North Carolina after it has been considered by the committee.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. If the whisky is in bond. Do you insist that this amendment does not apply to whisky in bond?

Mr. KITCHIN. It only applies to whisky on which the tax has already been paid.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Then it does not apply to whisky in bond.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. KITCHIN. Now, Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the word "gallon," line 20, page 9, insert:

"Provided, That the tax on such liquors in the custody of a court of bankruptcy in insolvency proceedings at the time of the passage of this act shall be paid by the person to whom the court delivers such liquors at the time of such delivery."

Mr. MANN. I would like to suggest to the gentleman from North Carolina that he use the language in the bill, and instead of saying "liquors" say "distilled spirits."

Mr. KITCHIN. I think the gentleman is right, and I will ask to modify the amendment in that particular.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will be modified, and the Clerk will report the amendment as modified.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the word "gallon," insert:

"Provided, That the tax on such distilled spirits in the custody of a court of bankruptcy in insolvency proceedings at the time of the passage of this act shall be paid by the person to whom the court delivers such distilled spirits at the time of such delivery."

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. KITCHIN. I will yield.

Mr. STAFFORD. Take this supposititious case: The retail liquor dealer has gone into bankruptcy and the trustee has been authorized at the time of the passage of the act to continue the business. Who would pay the tax under the gentleman's amendment?

Mr. KITCHIN. The trustee.

Mr. STAFFORD. But the amendment would exempt him; the liquor has been delivered to him by order of the court.

Mr. KITCHIN. Then it is in the hands of the retailer.

Mr. MEEKER. The man who purchases it would pay it, whether he was a retailer or wholesaler.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Carolina.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I did not intend to consume any time in the discussion of this measure, but I feel impelled to assign some reason for my support of a piece of legislation which its authors condemn before this House and before the world.

The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] and the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY], the champions of this bill on either side of the House, have consumed nine hours in discussing its different features. These able, distinguished, and learned gentlemen at the very outset of their arguments made the astounding statement that the bill has not the sanction or indorsement in its entirety of a single member of the committee from which it was reported. This able body of men have spent days and weeks poring over and studying the different provisions of this bill, in order that the great burdens it imposes upon the people would be so distributed that they would fall on all alike, but they tell us plainly that if we were not at war, that there is hardly a provision in the bill that would commend itself to this body. After spending weeks and weeks in framing a bill that might meet the requirements of the hour and raise the desired revenue without laying a heavy hand on anyone they acknowledge they have failed and confess their inability to frame such a measure. They were in better position than we who are not members of the Ways and Means Committee to go to the very roots of this question. They have conferred with experts in finance and with the soundest political economist of the country. They had access to all the data at the command of the Government. They have had other revenue bills before them for a guide. They have investigated the tax methods of other countries engaged in this war, and no one doubts for a moment that they have been painstaking, conscientious, and faithful in presenting a bill that they hoped might be acceptable to the American people. But I am convinced that no bill could be framed that would satisfy 100,000,000 people. Their interests are diversified and often antagonistic, and when you go down into men's pockets it is like pulling their eyeteeth. The Members of this House have been flooded with letters, telegrams, and protests from different interests to be affected asking that they be spared the burdens of this tax and that the burdens be placed somewhere else. No doubt some amendments will be offered that will slightly vary some of the provisions of this legislation, but in the main the bill will stand as it is written, because the great amount of money demanded must be raised and must be raised by taxation. There is no escape from that. The burdens will rest more heavily upon those more able to bear them, because it is generally conceded that the wealth of the Nation must very largely pay the taxes imposed by the necessities of this war.

This Congress was called together by the President of the United States for the purpose of having it declare war. After waiting for nearly three years, he and the American people decided that there was no other honorable course to pursue. A resolution for that purpose was offered, and, with little opposition, was quickly passed. A loan of $7,000,000,000 was speedily authorized by both branches of Congress without a dissenting vote. Our constituents from everywhere wrote us letters and sent us telegrams urging us to stand by the President in his war program. When the President and his advisers came to consider a plan for raising an army, they advocated a selective-draft plan in preference to the old volunteer system. The volunteer plan, they claimed, had been tried out fully and fairly by other countries engaged in this war, and they were forced to resort to the selective draft. The greatest military experts of the country advocated the selective draft. Our constituents, or a great majority of them, urged us to stand by the President. And Congress voted for the President's plan. [Applause.]

I confess that since this Congress has convened I have felt, as a great many other Members have, that a great responsibility rested upon us during this grave and trying crisis. We know that it is not popular to vote for a measure that will bear down so heavily upon the people as this bill will do, but we have a duty to perform, and we can not escape it. I have received protests from every part of my district and from all over the country against taxes placed upon certain schedules in this bill. I wish it were in my power to see them all exempted, and that it were possible to relieve them of the burdens, but that is impossible. We have entered this war, and there can be no retracing of our steps until we have brought it to a successful conclusion, and I am glad to say that, in my opinion, there is no part of this Nation more solidly behind the President than the South. I believe they will make the sacrifices as cheerfully and willingly as any section, and there is one class of people, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, who are acting like true philosophers and patriots in this trying ordeal, and that is the farmers of the South. [Applause.] At the beginning of this war, when their chief staple—cotton—was selling at 12 cents per pound, it suddenly dropped to one-half that price. The cotton exchanges of this country and Europe were closed. There was absolutely no demand for that great commodity. A committee of citizens, representing the farming industry, came to Washington to confer with the President and the Secretary of the Treasury to ascertain if some plan could not be arranged by which the Government could loan money to the farmers on their cotton, at a fair valuation, in order that it might not be sacrificed upon the market. They were informed that there was no precedent for such a proposition, and the Government was utterly powerless to aid the farmers in this matter. They returned to their homes disappointed, but not hostile or belligerent, and the local bankers forced them to put their cotton on the market, and it was sold for less than the cost of production, at 5 and 6 cents per pound, and a great majority of the farming classes were well-nigh ruined. Still they did not complain. They went about making another crop, and another crop, and at last they are beginning to come into their own. That magnificent product is now bringing a price that is commensurate with the investment and the labor that they have given to its production for many years past.

The distinguished gentleman who reported this bill tells us that in its consideration no partisan feeling crept into its discussions and deliberations. That is highly commendable and reflects the patriotism and loyalty of the country in standing by the President in this great crisis. There was one discordant note, however, while not political, it was sectional; it was heard in the committee room when this bill was being considered, and it was heard in this House in the discussion of this bill on Monday last. The distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE], in discussing this bill, stated that he hoped and expected to introduce an amendment calling attention to the fact that cotton has been prosperous and that cotton ought to pay. He stated further that at the proper time he would ask that a tax or at least $2.50 a bale be placed on that "magnificent product of American plantations." This, Mr. Chairman, would be a consumption tax. It would be an unfair and an unjust tax. When this bill was being considered by the committee they decided that a consumption tax should not be placed on any commodity, and I sincerely trust that, if the gentleman from Pennsylvania insists upon his amendment to tax this chief commodity of the South, it will receive but one vote, and that it will be the vote of the gentleman from Pennsylvania. [Applause.]

As I stated previously, I fully realize that many businesses will be seriously injured by this tax. Some will suffer more than others; but I am satisfied that it is a matter of utter impossibility to frame a bill of this kind that will operate on all industries alike. But the men who will be called upon to pay over money will not suffer in comparison to the men who are called upon to sacrifice their lives. The brave boys who have volunteered to defend their country, and those who will be selected to fight our battles, are responding with a loyalty and cheerfulness that ought to put to shame the men who are complaining and whining because their businesses will suffer on account of the war. Those men who have been blessed with riches and others who have been blessed with a fair degree of prosperity should willingly surrender a part of their wealth to the country, to be used in crushing militarism, in subjugating an international outlaw, and in saving civilization from destruction. [Applause.]

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 15, after line 14, insert a new paragraph, as follows:
"Amend section 18 of the act of February 8, 1875 (18 Stat., sec. 309), as amended by section 4 of the act of March 15, 1879 (20 Stat., 327), by striking out the following: 'That retail dealers in liquors shall pay $25,' and insert in lieu thereof the following: 'That retail dealers in liquors shall pay $5,000.'"

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the amendment is not germane.

Mr. HOWARD. Does the gentleman want to argue the point of order?

Mr. STAFFORD. I do not think there is any question about it. Unless the Chair wants to hear me I do not care to argue it.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman, I would like to know what the gentleman's point of order is.

Mr. STAFFORD. I make the point of order that it is not germane to any provision in the bill nor germane to any item in the title under consideration. I direct the Chair's attention to the rule that was adopted by the Democratic caucus when it came into power in presenting amendments to a revenue bill.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the gentleman's argument is not germane to the point of order. [Laughter.]

Mr. STAFFORD. It is not germane to a Kansas dry man who is new in this House. [Laughter.] Mr. Chairman, I direct the attention of the chairman of the committee to paragraph 3, rule 21, which provides as follows:

3. No amendment shall be in order to any bill affecting revenue which is not germane to the subject matter in the bill; nor shall any amendment to any item of such bill be in order which does not directly relate to the item to which the amendment is proposed.

That rule limits the rule of germaneness that prevailed in this House for more than 50 years. Even under general House parliamentary law, as is shown in the decision rendered by Speaker Carlisle, which was well fought out and will be found in volume 5 of Hinds' Precedents, section 2853, the amendment would not be germane.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will say to the gentleman from Wisconsin that he would like to hear from the gentleman from Georgia on the other side of the question. [Laughter.]

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman, I am afraid I am in the position of the country lawyer before a justice of the peace who had just assumed his duties in court, that the court has already prejudged my case by stopping the argument of the gentleman from Wisconsin. [Laughter.]

It occurs to me that this title deals with all characters of revenue from the sale of distilled spirits and malt liquors. It goes further than that. It deals with the business. Now, I am talking about actual business of these people. Let me call the attention of the Chair to section 309:

That each manufacturer, producer, dealer, importer shall make monthly returns—

And so forth. And then it says how they shall do it, and then over in sections 305, 306, and 307, all deal with the business of men engaged in the production and manufacture of alcoholic spirits. Now, what does my amendment do?

The object of this bill is to raise revenue. That is solely the object of the bill. My amendment proposes to increase the license upon retail dealers in distilled spirits from $25 to $5,000 a year. I am perfectly willing to admit, for the sake of argument, that the power to tax carries with it the power to destroy, and that my motive in introducing this amendment is not to raise the revenue from that particular source, but to cut off the source of distribution of these liquor dealers who are sitting up behind 250,000,000 gallons of liquor with which to keep the Nation drunk while we are at war. That is the purpose of it. I think it is germane. I think it deals with the subject matter of this title.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOWARD. Yes.

Mr. SABATH. So the gentleman's amendment would not comply with the purpose of the bill to raise revenue, but it would destroy the revenue?

Mr. HOWARD. I admit that; that is the object that I had in mind. It might incidentally raise more revenue.

Mr. SABATH. But the gentleman admits that his object is to destroy revenue?

Mr. HOWARD. As far as the gentleman from Illinois is concerned, he is not hurt by this. This does not deal with beer at all. It does not hurt beer, but it applies to liquor.

Mr. SABATH. Oh, it would not hurt me even if it would apply to beer, or even if it should apply to Coca-Cola.

Mr. HOWARD. That would not hurt the gentleman. The subject matter with which this amendment deals is liquor, and this whole title deals with liquor except where it deals with carbonic gas and soft drinks.

The CHAIRMAN. This bill is for the purpose of raising revenue. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HOWARD] is very frank in stating that the object of his amendment is not to raise revenue, but to prevent the sale of liquors and destroy the business. The amendment is not germane to the section or the bill, and the Chair therefore sustains the point of order.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out all on page 8, commencing with line 24, down to and inclusive of line 20, on page 9.

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, the amendment that I have just offered strikes out all tax of liquor.

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have the amendment reported.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out sections 300 and 301.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Georgia yield?

Mr. HOWARD. Yes.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman knows that it would be in order to offer an amendment to increase the tax on distilled spirits?

Mr. HOWARD. Yes; I do.

Mr. MANN. Even to $5,000——

Mr. HOWARD. A gallon—yes; I know that. Mr. Chairman, my purpose in offering the amendment a moment ago was this: There has been a war waged for the last three weeks in this Capitol—and every gentleman here on either side of the House knows that what I am about to state is the exact truth—between the beer people and the liquor people. What is the object of this? I will tell you. There are efforts being made on the food-conservation bill in this House to conserve the grain by prohibiting the making of beer and liquor. Let us see who will be the sufferers by it.

If you prohibit the use of grain in the making of beer, light wines, and liquor, the beer men go entirely out of business, and the liquor people, who have 300,000,000 gallons of liquor in the bonded warehouses of the country would immediately increase the value of that product from about $4.50 a gallon to about $10 a gallon. Then the people of the country who have been accustomed to the use of the less harmful form of intoxication will, by force of habit, have to use the ardent spirits, to wit, liquor, or nothing. In other words, if we carry out our program, which this Nation is demanding, the liquor men will be Br'er Rabbit in the brier patch, as Uncle Remus says, and the beer men will be out of business. The manufacturer of spirituous liquors is not being tolerated by the Canadian Government, by the German Government, by the French Government, by the British Government, by any of the Governments at war. Light wines and malt liquors are permitted under restrictions. All this bosh that you see in these circulars we are getting from liquor men about these nations permitting the indiscriminate sale of liquor is absolutely unfounded. They do not do anything of the sort, and even in England there has been a reduction in the amount permitted to be manufactured of beer from 36,000,000 barrels to 10,000,000 barrels. Let us look at this thing for a moment. I think you gentlemen know me well enough, especially the older Members, to know that I am a liberal prohibitionist. You know me well enough to know that I am willing to make any sort of a decent compromise that will bring about the complete sobering up of this Nation. This is a proposition that the people of the Nation are going to legislate upon. If you gentlemen do not do the sensible thing about it, the drastic thing is going to be done. Mark my prediction; mark what I tell you. The people of the United States of America, the modern Nation of civilization, during this war are not going to permit the young men of this Nation who go to arms in our defense to go into battle drunk on liquor. You can put that down as a certainty. Some legislation has got to be enacted, and it is going to be enacted, and you gentlemen who represent constituencies having in them large breweries and distilleries are making a mistake in thinking that you are going away from this Capitol when we adjourn at the end of this session with no legislation enacted in this great Nation, when all of the other great nations of the earth have acted upon this vital and momentous question.

It is the greatest economic question we have ever had to face, as well as the greatest moral question we have ever had thrust upon us. What have we done with this bill? You may have heard some objections to certain portions of it, but who has objected to this tax on liquor? They are delighted to have you put this tax on them. They are glad you have put the additional $1.10 on liquor. Why? Because they get their tentacles into the body politics of this Nation that much deeper.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman, I would ask for three minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent to proceed for three minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask how soon the time for debate will be exhausted?

The CHAIRMAN. There is no limit fixed.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I thought there was an agreement.

The CHAIRMAN. There is no agreement.

Mr. HOWARD. I would not have asked for the additional time if there had been.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I am not going to object, but I understood there was an agreement to close debate at 4 o'clock.

The CHAIRMAN. No; it was objected to by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON].

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Well, still reserving the right to object, I shall ask that the time of the gentleman be extended, if he will yield for a question.

Mr. HOWARD. I will.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman that he have three minutes additional? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I am dealing with this question for revenue purposes solely. I know the gentleman has another and more sentimental interest in it; but the facts, as reported by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, are that he collected from distilled spirits the last fiscal year $158,000,000, and the gentleman proposes to strike out distilled spirits.

Mr. HOWARD. Yes, sir.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Now, if we collected——

Mr. HOWARD. I mean the additional tax of $1.10.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I understand. Now, if we collected $158,000,000 from distilled spirits last year and by this bill propose to tax them $100,000,000 more, which would make $258,000,000, how are we going to raise that revenue to prosecute the war?

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman, I will answer that. Sixty per cent of the population of this Nation already have declared themselves positively and unequivocably in favor of prohibition.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Pardon me, but will the gentleman yield for one more question?

Mr. HOWARD. Now, let me answer this question; I can not answer two, but I will try to do it, however.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. On the very point the gentleman raises, that the Nation has spoken for prohibition, I want the gentleman to discuss that, and in doing so would like him to account for the fact that the revenue commissioner reports, despite the Nation wanted prohibition, that the Government collected $13,385,000 more from distilled spirits last year, 1916, than in the year previous?

Mr. HOWARD. Yes; and you manufactured more liquor in the United States last year than you ever have before in the history of the Nation, and why? You know why and every other intelligent man knows why. Why do you try to make the people of this Nation believe that we are becoming more and more addicted to the use of liquor by quoting the amount distilled in 1916? It was because of the war. Why does not the gentleman look to the exports of ethyl alcohol and other spirits that went to Europe, and the gentleman will see why it increased? There is nothing in that argument, and the gentleman knows it, and nobody knows it better than the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. On the question of prohibition the gentleman believes——

Mr. HOWARD. I want to answer that, and if I can get more time I will try to do that. We do not want the revenue from this liquor, we do not want to entrench the liquor people more securely than they are now in the governmental affairs of this Nation and——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. If the gentleman is right about prohibition marching on, it is difficult to account for the increased manufacture of liquor.

Mr. HOWARD. I have just told the gentleman as plain as the English language can convey my thoughts that the reason it increased was because of our exportations, on account of the increase in the manufacture of munitions in this country and Europe and——

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOWARD. I yield.

Mr. COX. When the Reed amendment becomes effective on the 1st day of next July, I do not think the figures of the report of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue will show——

Mr. HOWARD. Of course they will not.

Mr. BARKLEY. I would like to remind the gentleman from Georgia that in anticipation last year that this tax was to be increased the distillers withdrew from bond a great quantity of whisky and paid the tax, and that accounts for a great deal of the increase.

Mr. HOWARD. Of course they did.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman knows there is no tax on exports, and that this increased revenue does not come from exports.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BURNETT. I would ask that the gentleman's time be extended so that I may ask him a question.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. There is no tax on exports.

Mr. BARKLEY. It has to be withdrawn from bond.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The revenue is derived from domestic consumption, goods consumed in the United States, not exported.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Georgia have five minutes more. Is there objection?

Mr. MEEKER. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object——

Mr. NOLAN. Mr. Chairman, I object.

Mr. BURNETT. Why is it if there has been an increase all the time in the consumption of liquor are men opposing prohibition if drinking——

Mr. HOWARD. I can not answer that question; I did not understand my status or I would not have occupied the floor.

Mr. BURNETT. I thought the gentleman had been granted five minutes additional.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman: I desire to address myself to section 302, which imposes——

Mr. MEEKER. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman can not make a parliamentary inquiry while the gentleman from Kentucky has the floor.

Mr. MEEKER. Was not debate to expire at 4 o'clock?

Mr. HOWARD. Oh, no.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON] will proceed.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman: I desire to address myself to section 302 of the bill, which section imposes a tax of 15 cents a gallon on rectified or adulterated spirits. I would not do so except that Congress has been circularized by the rectifiers, and I apprehend that before this bill has reached final passage the question as to whether or not rectified or adulterated whiskey shall bear any tax at all will be well fought out. For that reason I now wish to correct some of the fallacious arguments which have been and which will be advanced by the rectifiers.

The present tax on straight whiskey is $1.10 a gallon. Under the proposed bill that tax is to be doubled. When a tax first was placed on whiskey there had to be, of necessity, a fixed unit; or, rather, a fixed gallon upon which to levy the tax. The gallon was fixed with contents of 231 cubic inches, and that gallon also has been fixed by law to consist of 50 per cent alcohol and 50 per cent water. That to-day is the standard gallon; and that standard gallon is designated as the "proof gallon" and also as the "100-proof gallon," which, as I just said, is made of 50 per cent alcohol and the remaining 50 per cent of water, fusel oil and various ethers and acids. Now, whenever the proof is 100 the tax is $1.10 a gallon.

It may be best for me to say here, in further explanation, that in the trade and in the law there are two kinds of gallon—one known as the "proof gallon" and the other as the "wine gallon." The proof gallon is the one which is ascertained by the quantity of alcohol that is in it, and the other, the "wine gallon," is nothing more nor less than a measured gallon of 231 cubic inches.

Now to go back, after that explanation, pure or straight whiskey which is 100 proof bears a tax of $1.10 a gallon, no matter whether that gallon be "proof gallon" or "wine gallon." On straight whiskey, if the proof, or alcoholic contents, goes down the tax does not go down. If the proof is 90 on straight whiskey, the tax is still $1.10 a gallon. If the proof is 80, the tax is still $1.10 a gallon. If the proof is 70 or lower, the tax is still $1.10 a gallon. In other words, no matter how low the proof may go below 100 on straight whiskey the tax is still $1.10 a gallon. But if the proof goes above 100 the tax increases at the same rate that the alcoholic contents increase. Now, that is the case as to straight whiskey.

The case relative to rectified whiskey is almost the reverse. Now, mark you, before I get to that, the 100-proof gallon of straight whiskey, is half alcohol and half water, and the tax is $1.10. Now, if nothing but the alcohol in that gallon were taxed, the tax would be $1.10 on the 50 per cent of alcohol which is in it. But that is not the manner of taxation. The plan of taxation is to tax the whole contents of that gallon, one-half of it being water. Consequently, half of that tax of $1.10 a gallon is levied on the alcohol that is in the gallon, and the other half is levied on the water that is in the gallon, making $1.10 a gallon.

Now, when you come to rectified whiskey, whenever the proof is 100—and nobody ever heard of 100-proof rectified whiskey—but if there were such a thing, the tax would be $1.10 a gallon.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Kentucky be extended 10 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Does the gentleman need 10 minutes?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I would like to have it.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I move the gentleman's time be extended 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I hope the gentleman will yield to a few questions before he gets through.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Now, as I was saying when I was interrupted, when you come to the tax on rectified whiskey the proof is invariably below 100. I have already told you no matter how far below 100 the proof on straight whiskey may go the tax of $1.10 a gallon still remains; but when the proof on rectified whiskey is reduced below 100 the tax on it is also reduced.

Mr. BARKLEY. Will my colleague yield right there?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Yes.

Mr. BARKLEY. On straight whiskey when the proof goes down to 70 tell the House what the other 30 per cent is made of.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. When whiskey is below proof the alcoholic contents are always one-half of the proof. So in 70 proof whiskey the alcoholic contents are 35 per cent and the water is 65 per cent.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Now, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. If that is so, then 90 per cent proof would mean——

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. It would mean 45 per cent alcohol and 55 per cent water.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. And a full tax additional of $1.10?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. No; it would not if it were rectified; but if it were straight whisky it would be $1.10. On straight whiskey at 90 proof the tax would be $1.10, and on rectified whiskey at the same proof it would be 99 cents, a discrimination in favor of rectified whiskey of 11 cents on the gallon.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. What would be the water content of the rectified gallon on the wine-gallon basis?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. At what proof?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. At 90 proof; at the proof you are using as an illustration.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. As I just said, the alcoholic content is always one-half of the proof. At 90 proof the contents would be 45 per cent alcohol and 55 per cent water.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Then in the case of the straight whiskey the tax would be levied upon straight whiskey up to 90 proof?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. The tax is never less on straight at 90 proof than it is at 100 proof.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I want to get at the fact whether the alcoholic content of a gallon pays an additional per cent of tax to the gallon when the proof is above 100.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. A standard gallon of straight whiskey at 100 proof is half alcohol and half water. On that the tax is $1.10 and——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Now, then, in the case of the rectified gallon——

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. At what proof?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. At the proof the gentleman is referring to as the standard for the straight whiskey gallon. The water content would be about one-half?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. The gentleman asks what the tax on straight whiskey would be at 100 proof and what the tax on rectified whiskey would be at 100 proof. My answer is the tax would be the same.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Then one-half of the entire tax would be upon one-half of the water content of the rectified gallon?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. That is the point I am seeking to make. The 50 per cent water in the gallon of straight whiskey is taxed just as the alcohol is taxed, while none of the water in rectified whiskey, no matter how little it may be, is taxed at all.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Then if the rectified whiskey is taxed at the same rate straight whiskey is taxed, the Government taxes the one-half gallon water content at the same rate as whiskey?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Whenever any kind of whiskey, straight or rectified, is 100 proof, then the water in both of them is taxed, and taxed alike; but such is not the case if the rectified is less than 100 proof.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That is it. The Government taxes water to the extent of half a gallon in the matter of rectified whiskey.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. When the proof is 100, yes; but as the proof, or alcoholic content, decreases in the rectified the percentage of water in the gallon increases, and that increase in percentage of water is not taxed when in rectified whiskey.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I am making the point that in the matter of rectified whiskey, concerning which the gentleman is speaking just now, the Government actually taxes one-half water?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. It does if the proof is 100, but it does not if the proof is less than 100.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I do not know which is the greater offense against the consumer.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman state what is meant by "rectified whiskey"?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I mean by "rectified whiskey" just what the law defines it to be—an imitation of pure whiskey.

The great bulk of rectified whiskey is made from neutral spirits. Commercial alcohol is 188 proof; in other words, it is 188 points out of a possible 200; while neutral spirits is 190 proof—two points higher than commercial alcohol.

Neutral spirits comes from the tail of the worm at 190 proof. At that proof the tax is paid on it. One gallon of neutral spirits at 190 proof contains 1.9 wine or measured gallons; or, in other words, a gallon at 100 proof now bears a tax of ten times 11 cents. A gallon of neutral spirits at 190 proof now bears a tax of nineteen times 11 cents, because it is excessive in alcohol and above the normal gallon by nine-tenths.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. In a moment.

Mr. COX. All right.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Now, then, further answering the gentleman from Tennessee, this neutral spirits, which is practically colorless, tasteless and odorless, is diluted with water down to a point where it is potable. But those who rectify do not stop diluting it with water at the point at which it is potable, and all liquors are potable at 100 proof. They go below the 100 proof by adding water in order that they may make more wine or measured gallons out of one, thereby escaping the tax on all the increased quantity which they have thus made.

Neutral spirits used in the manufacture of rectified whiskey is diluted with water, as I have just said, and that dilution runs from 90 proof down as low as 50 proof. The average proof of rectified whiskey, so I am informed by the Internal Revenue Department, is 80 proof. Water is added to the neutral spirits to bring the average of it down to the average of 80, and then coloring matter is added to make it look like whiskey and a beading oil is added, so that when you shake the bottle a bead of oil will form around the edge of it in imitation of the bead on pure whiskey, and then to each barrel of rectified whiskey about 5 gallons of real whiskey, so the department informs me, is added to make it smell like whiskey.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Yes.

Mr. STEVENSON. What is the tax on the 80 per cent proof?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. The tax on a gallon of straight whiskey at 100 or less is $1.10, and——

Mr. STEVENSON. Yes; I know that.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. On 80-proof rectified whiskey the tax is 88 cents, a discrimination of 22 cents a gallon in favor of rectified whiskey, and the discrimination amounts to $11 on each barrel of rectified whiskey, and during all the years that a tax has been imposed upon whiskey the United States Government has made a present to the rectifier of the difference in tax between straight whiskey and rectified whiskey. Last year that discrimination amounted to approximately $22,000,000.

Yesterday we heard it said on the floor, when reference was made to section 302 of this bill, that that section related to the "little men" in the liquor business. Let us see whether the rectifier is the little man or not. Last year about 100,000,000 gallons of rectified whiskey went into consumption in the United States, and only about 32,000,000 gallons of straight whiskey went into consumption as a beverage. In other words, more than three times as much rectified whiskey as straight whiskey was used as a beverage last year in the United States.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman from Kentucky yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman has me confused. I am asking this in good faith. It seems to me whether you call it whiskey or whether you call it rectified whiskey it would be equitable that the tax ought to be equal on the amount of alcohol, whether it is rectified whiskey or straight whiskey.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I agree thoroughly with the gentleman.

Mr. CANNON. Now, if the gentleman will fix his amendment that way, cutting out the rectified and cutting out the table whiskey, I will vote for it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired again.

Mr. MILLER of Washington. I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman be extended.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I also ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Kentucky be extended.

The CHAIRMAN. Unanimous consent is asked that the time of the gentleman from Kentucky be extended. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I will say to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] that I prepared such an amendment as he suggests and offered it to the Ways and Means Committee for their consideration. For some reason not known to me they deemed it best not to incorporate it in the bill, but I now submit the amendment to the gentleman from Illinois for his consideration. I now yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. FORDNEY. Is it true that the alcohol in rectified spirit has already paid the tax before the spirit is rectified?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. FORDNEY. Therefore the tax imposed in this bill is really for the water and the little sirup and coloring and sweetening and the bead upon it. It is a tax upon the man who rectifies the spirit, who has already paid the tax on the alcohol?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Whether it be straight whiskey or the neutral spirit, which forms the basis of the rectified whiskey, the tax has been paid on it before it goes into the rectifier's establishment; but in the rectifier's compound no tax is paid on anything except the alcohol that is in it; while upon the straight whiskey the tax is imposed not only upon the alcohol that is in it but also upon the water that is in it.

Mr. STEVENSON. If the straight whiskey is reduced by water to 80 proof, it is taxed, as I understand, at $1.10.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. There is a law which forbids the reduction of straight whiskey to 80 proof, except that it be bottled in bond for export. The rectifiers have so managed things that low-proof straight whiskey can not be put upon the market in the United States in competition with their low-proof product.

Last year 100,000,000 gallons of rectified whiskey were used as a beverage in the United States. The average proof of that rectified product, as I have said, was 80.

The difference between the tax on 80 proof rectified whiskey and the tax on the lowest proof at which straight whisky may be tax-paid is 22 cents a gallon. Therefore when 100,000,000 gallons of rectified spirits go into consumption in a year in the United States, then the United States Government annually makes the rectifier a present of $22,000,000, because that is the difference in tax between those two products when the tax is at the rate of $1.10 a gallon.

Now, some gentleman has suggested that if you impose this tax the rectifiers will go out of business. Suppose they do go out of business, what happens? Then the people who drink whiskey must of necessity drink straight whiskey; and when the rectifier goes out of business the Government loses no revenue, because there is no tax at all upon his product; and if this item in the bill passes and becomes law, it will be the first tax ever imposed upon rectified whiskey. It is true that the rectifier pays an occupation tax. Whoever rectifies less than 500 barrels in a year pays a tax of $100, and whoever rectifies 500 or more barrels in a year pays a tax of $200, and that occupation tax upon rectifiers amounts to about $300,000 a year. If all the rectifiers should go out of business, the Government would lose $300,000, but it would be more than equaled by the increased consumption of pure whiskey. But the rectifier will not go out of business as long as the tax on his product is less than 44 cents a gallon, provided the whiskey tax is put up to $2.20.

If you impose this tax of 15 cents a gallon, then you will collect $15,000,000, based on last year's consumption of rectified whiskey. The distiller of straight whiskey does not pay a tax as distiller. He simply pays the tax on the goods he produces. Upon the other hand, the rectifier pays an insignificant occupation tax, and then pays no tax upon his product. Upon each barrel of rectified whiskey there is placed a "rectified" stamp. The United States Government furnishes that stamp. But when the straight distiller bottles his whiskey in bond, a stamp must go over the neck of the bottle, showing that it is bottled in bond, and that it is 100 proof; and then a stamp must go upon the case, and the distiller is compelled by law to pay for these stamps. The distillers pay more than $300,000 a year for these stamps, while the rectifier gets his stamps for nothing.

There is no statute on our books that does not discriminate in favor of the rectifier and against the producer of straight whiskey.

We heard only a few minutes ago that national prohibition is coming. When prohibition comes for the Nation every distiller will have the value of his property practically destroyed. The distilleries over the country are built of brick and stone and mortar. They are substantial structures. Inside these buildings they have costly machinery. The stills are made of copper. Every distiller's plant is worth thousands and thousands of dollars. But let us see about the rectifier. What has he to lose when prohibition comes? Every rectifier is also a wholesale or retail liquor dealer, and most of the wholesale liquor dealers are rectifiers. The wholesale liquor dealer, if he be a rectifier, has his wholesale establishment on the ground floor in some city and his rectifying establishment upstairs—and that consists of tubs and paddles with which to stir the water and whiskey together.

Mr. TILSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Yes.

Mr. TILSON. Will the gentleman say something as to the basis of these two products, straight whiskey and neutral spirits; that is, as to the grain that is used in these products.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Straight whiskey is the product just as it comes from the distillery, nothing added and nothing subtracted. Straight whiskey is put in the bonded warehouse usually at about a proof of 101, so as to make some allowance for loss of proof before it is bottled at 100 proof. That 100 proof, as I have said several times, is made up of 50 per cent alcohol and the other 50 per cent water, fusel oil and various ethers and acids. Neutral spirits has practically all of the water and the ethers and acids extracted while it is being distilled. Then it is run through charcoal and the fusel oil is taken out. In selling the rectified product the claim is made that the fusel oil should be taken out.

When a man takes a drink out of a barrel of whiskey the day it is made and then stores the barrel away for something like 12 or 15 years until, by evaporation and absorption into the wood, the volume has been reduced one-half, and then he takes a drink out of the same barrel, he will get twice as much fusel oil as he got in the first drink. In other words, while the volume of alcohol and water decreases during the aging period, the quantity of fusel oil originally in the barrel does not decrease. This is one of the principal reasons why whiskey which has become old in wood is the best whiskey.

Everybody knows that to some extent alcohol is poison. The straight-whiskey producer leaves in his product the fusel oil and various ethers and acids which offset, to some extent, the poisonous effect of the alcohol. The producer of neutral spirits extracts practically all of that, and why? To escape the tax.

The situation now, in plain language, is: The producer of neutral spirits extracts everything possible from his product, and the rectifier who uses it in making rectified whiskey sees to it that it remains exactly so just long enough for it to get past the tax collector. As soon as it gets past the tax collector it is rolled into the rectifier's establishment and the water is reincorporated, and escapes the tax which straight whiskey pays. We have here a proposition to tax rectified spirits 15 cents a gallon, and when the whiskey tax is increased to $2.20 a gallon the tax difference between pure and adulterated whiskey will be exactly 44 cents. I say the rectifiers have no right to complain at a 15-cent tax, and no one should lift his hand in opposition to the bill for the reason that the Committee on Ways and Means has brought into this House a bill which imposes upon them approximately only one-third of the tax which they ought to pay. If there is to be a discrimination between these products, who doubts that the discrimination should be in favor of straight whiskey instead of the rectified?

By some means that I do not know, and the committee themselves, according to my interrogations, do not know, there crept into the first draft of this bill a proposition to repeal the pure food and drugs act as to branding and labeling rectified goods, and if the committee had accepted that draft, which came from "somewhere in America," then the "spurious" could have been branded as the "pure" is branded, notwithstanding the pure food and drugs act.

Mr. SABATH. Does the gentleman call straight whiskey a whiskey that contains 50 per cent of alcohol and 50 per cent of water?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I do not. Straight whiskey is that which continues just as it came from the tail of the worm—nothing added and nothing subtracted.

Mr. SABATH. What does it contain?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. It contains 50 per cent alcohol, and the remaining 50 per cent is made up largely of water, but in that 50 per cent also there is fusel oil and some ethers and acids.

Mr. SABATH. In a rectified whiskey there is a little more water than alcohol. If it is five points below there is just that much more water than alcohol.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Yes.

Mr. SABATH. And the gentleman believes that the water should be taxed as well as the alcohol.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I believe that if the water in straight whiskey is taxed that the water in adulterated whiskey should be taxed also.

Mr. SABATH. But you do not tax the water, you tax the alcohol.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Oh, no; the tax is levied on the whole gallon, which is made up of both alcohol and water if straight whiskey.

Mr. SABATH. In proportion to the proof of the whiskey?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Oh, no. If straight whiskey is anywhere below 100 proof it pays the same tax, $1.10, as if it were 100 proof; but if it is rectified whiskey the tax goes down as the proof goes down.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Yes.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Am I correct in the conclusion that with respect to this stuff which you call rectified whiskey, the only tax that is put on that, leaving out these occupational taxes, to which you have referred, is the tax put on the alcohol that goes into it?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. The rectified whiskey pays no tax now except upon the alcohol that is in it.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Take a gallon of rectified whiskey. How much tax does that pay?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. At what proof?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Eighty.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Straight whiskey at that proof pays $1.10 a gallon, and rectified whisky at the same proof pays only 88 cents a gallon.

Mr. SABATH. Are they both not taxed upon the proportionate amount of alcohol which they contain?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. No. The rectifier can go as far below 100 proof as he chooses to go, and the lower the proof goes the lower the tax is—but not so with straight whiskey.

Mr. SABATH. The higher the proof the more alcohol, and the lower the proof the less alcohol.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Certainly.

Mr. SABATH. That is what I wanted to get at.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Yes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Has the gentleman any accurate information as to the number of bushels of grain manufactured into alcoholic drinks during the last calendar year?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I have not. I have not gone into that subject. But I will say this, that the large distilleries are required to produce 80 per cent of 4¾ gallons to the bushel of grain, and they are taxed upon that basis whether they make that yield or not. The smaller distilleries are required to make a smaller yield per bushel, because their facilities are not so good.

Recently I received a circular letter or brief from James Olwell & Co., liquor dealers, 181 West Street, New York, protesting against placing a tax on rectified spirits. I suspect each Member of Congress received a similar letter or brief.

The firm of James Olwell & Co. must themselves be rectifiers, otherwise they would not have sent out the brief just referred to. However, the records of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue will show whether or not they are rectifiers. But it is a certainty they are, and that they deal in adulterated whiskey.

This firm says in its brief: "Congress will make a tremendous mistake if it taxes rectified spirits." They say, first, that it would be "double taxation." Nobody proposes to "double tax" the alcohol in adulterated liquors. But it is proposed to tax the water in adulterated liquors, because the water in straight whiskey is taxed; but it is now proposed to tax the water in adulterated whiskey to only about one-third the extent that water in straight whiskey is taxed.

Before this firm or any other rectifier gets possession of the alcohol which goes into the imitation whiskey the tax already has been paid on it; and when they add water to the already tax-paid, high-proof alcohol, and thereby increase the number of gallons, they do not pay a cent additional tax; and yet they undertake to mislead Congress by the statement that the proposed tax would be "double taxation." The alcohol is the only ingredient in any adulterated whiskey which this firm or any other firm may make which is taxed; while, as I have said, all the alcohol, all of the water, the oil and acid ingredients in the pure and unadulterated whiskey are taxed.

The letter or brief of this firm says further that the tax on adulterated whiskey will not yield the tax expected, because they say the tax will make the cheaper goods too dear, and that the trade will buy new, straight, cheap whiskies instead. Let us see. No one will dispute that high-proof rectified whiskey sells for more money than the low-proof, because a greater quantity of alcohol sells for more money than a lesser quantity of alcohol, and alcohol is worth more money than water. If there should be such a thing as rectified whiskey at 100 proof, it would be 50 per cent alcohol and 50 per cent water. As the water costs nothing the rectifier would take into consideration the cost of the alcohol only which he would use in making adulterated whiskey. Consequently the adulterated or imitation whiskey containing 50 per cent of alcohol would be worth more than the same character of goods containing less alcohol and more water. The rectifier certainly can sell a product which contains 25 per cent alcohol and 75 per cent water cheaper than he can sell a product which contains 50 per cent alcohol and 50 per cent water. That proposition is too plain to be argued, because the alcohol is the only ingredient in his product which costs anything worth mentioning.

Olwell & Co. also say in their brief that the "cheaper grades" of adulterated whiskey must go out of the market if the tax is imposed, and that the trade will turn to new straight whiskey instead.

Neither I nor any other person will be willing to accept the statement that the trade can substitute "new straight whiskey," which is high in alcohol, for goods low in alcohol. No straight whiskey, either old or new, can be tax paid on a basis of less than 50 per cent alcohol. New straight whiskey bears the same tax per gallon that old straight whiskey bears.

If it costs 50 cents a proof gallon to manufacture straight whiskey, and the tax thereon is $2.20 per gallon, then the first cost is $2.70 per gallon.

If it costs 50 cents to manufacture the proof gallon of alcohol which is used in adulterated whiskey, and only 40 per cent of that gallon of alcohol is used in an adulterated gallon, then the difference between 50 per cent and 40 per cent has been saved by the rectifier, and is clear profit; and, also, there has been saved at the same time the nonpayment of tax on the 10 per cent of water added.

The question now arises: How much does that 10 per cent difference in alcohol amount to? Ten per cent of the production of cost of the alcohol is 5 cents, and 10 per cent of the tax is 22 cents; and the nonpayment of tax on the added water amounts to another 22 cents. These three sums which are thus saved amount to 49 cents a gallon.

The tax proposed in this bill is 15 cents a gallon on adulterated whiskey, and adulterated whiskey at 80 proof costs 49 cents a gallon less than "new straight whiskey." The payment of the tax of 15 cents a gallon on the adulterated whiskey would still leave the rectifier a profit margin equal to the difference between 49 cents and 15 cents, and that difference is 34 cents. As before stated, 5 cents of the saving would be on the cost of manufacturing the alcohol, and 22 cents would be in tax, and an additional 22 cents would be saved by not paying tax on the added water. Consequently Olwell & Co. could continue to make imitation whiskey at 80 proof at 34 cents a gallon less, or $17 per barrel less, than "new straight whiskey" would cost.

The Internal Revenue Department has informed me that 80 proof is the average proof of the adulterated whiskey which is put upon the market. Consequently, as 80 proof is the general average, that is not the "cheaper grade" which Olwell & Co. mention in their brief, and the profit would be more on the "cheaper grades" than on the average grade.

At the conclusion of my remarks I shall read a table which I have prepared to show the difference between the tax on straight whiskey and that on adulterated whiskey. In that table will be found the tax on the "cheaper grades" mentioned by Olwell & Co.

I was about to overlook the statement of Olwell & Co. to the effect that if adulterated whiskey should go out of the market that those who drank whiskey would be compelled to drink "straight whiskey." Who can imagine that it would be a calamity for a fellow to be compelled to drink the real article instead of the imitation?

Again, imitation whiskey, which is short in alcohol and long in water, when shipped from one place to another has to bear the freight on the excessive quantity of water in it. Why would it not be better for the consumer and the retailer to have that which is long in alcohol and short in water shipped to them, and they themselves add the water to reduce it in proof? Such a plan would save the freight or express charges; and at the same time would lessen the price, because they would not be compelled to buy the water which is in the compound.

The saloon keeper or anyone else can rectify or adulterate whiskey or reduce it in proof provided the adulteration or reduction of proof is done in a receptacle of less than 5 gallons capacity; and, provided further, that the adulterated compound is thereafter kept in a receptacle having a capacity of less than 5 gallons.

Often I have wondered why the saloon keeper does not buy the high-proof goods instead of the low and add his own coloring matter, bead oil and water at almost no cost, and make that profit for himself instead of buying the water from Olwell & Co. and then pay the freight or express on it?

Olwell & Co. also say in their brief that the best grades of rectified whiskey are nothing more nor less than "several old straight whiskies blended together and reduced to a potable strength of, say, 90 per cent proof."

Why not leave the proof of these "several old straight whiskies" at 100 proof and let the buyer himself add the water, if he wishes to reduce it to 90 proof?

The reason is that the rectifier wants to sell water under the pretense that it is whiskey.

Again, why mix the "several old straight whiskies"? Are they mixed for the purpose of injuring the best of the several grades, or are they mixed in order to improve the worst of the several grades put into the mixture, which is dignified by being called a "blend"? The question answers itself.

Still again, Olwell & Co. say in their brief that neutral spirit, which is really the base of adulterated whiskey, is "a pure and clean spirit with all the poisonous oils and essences removed and far superior to new straight whiskey." If that statement be true why does the rectifier try so hard to have his superior article resemble the inferior? The only truthful answer is: He knows better, but is endeavoring to defraud.

While Olwell & Co. say that imitation whiskey made from neutral spirit is better than "new, straight whiskey," they are not reckless enough to say that such imitation whiskey is better than old straight whiskey. If their imitation whiskey made from neutral spirits is any better than "new straight whiskey," because the oils and essences are removed from the imitation whiskey, then the imitation whiskey which is without the oils and essences must of necessity be infinitely better than the old straight whiskey, because 12 or 15 year old straight whiskey which has been aged in wood contains twice as much oil and essence as it contained when it was first made. In 12 or 15 years a 50-gallon barrel of whiskey, by evaporation and soakage, is reduced in volume to about one-half the original contents. The reduction in volume is occasioned only by the loss of alcohol and water. The quantity of oil and essence which is in the barrel when the whisky was only 1 day old is just the same 12, 15, 20, 25, or even 50 years afterwards. The older the whiskey becomes in wood the greater will be the per cent of oil and essence to the drink. Any chemist who can analyze the old and the new will tell you that.

Olwell & Co. further along in their brief say:

"If a tax is put on straight whiskey every retail dealer will become a rectifier, color and sweeten and mix their own goods in quantities under 5 gallons unaffected by the law."

It will be noticed that in the above quotation they predict what will happen "if a tax be put on straight whiskey." As there already is a tax of $1.10 a gallon on straight whiskey, I suppose they intended to predict what will happen if the tax on straight whiskey should be increased. Certainly the retail dealer has not become a rectifier under the $1.10 tax, because the wholesale rectifiers, who are the middlemen between the spirit manufacturer and the retail dealers, last year disposed of 100,000,000 gallons of their product, while less than one-third of that quantity of straight whiskey went into beverage consumption. But even if the retailer should become a rectifier and color, sweeten, and mix his own goods, what harm would be done by his doing it instead of having it done by the wholesale rectifier? Certainly it would cut out the unnecessary profit of the middleman, who is now adulterating for the retail dealer.

Olwell & Co., the disinterested (?) opponents of a tax on adulterated whiskey, state in their brief that the United States Government recognizes the harmfulness of immature whiskey when it requires whiskey to be full four years old before it will allow it to be bottled in bond.

I say that the United States recognizes no such thing. It is true that straight whiskey must be four years old before it can be bottled in bond, but the reason is not the one alleged by Olwell & Co. The enormous profit of the maker of adulterated whisky is not on barreled goods, but is on bottled goods. Unquestionably it was the rectifier who imposed on Congress at the time the bottled-in-bond law was passed, to fix the age at four years, so that there would be less competition for the rectifier in bottled goods. Under existing law the pure article must be four years old before it can be bottled in bond, but at the same time the spurious or imitation whiskey can be bottled and sold before it is four minutes old.

The United States Government is not looking after the whiskey-drinking public to the extent alleged by Olwell & Co. If so, why does not the United States Government forbid straight whiskey under four years old from going upon the market in barrels? There is no legal restriction against the sale of new, straight whiskey in barrels, and more straight whiskey is sold in barrels than in bottles.

While I am talking of new whiskey I will say that I once heard what was told as an anecdote, but what really might have happened. As the story ran a rectifier stood on the ground floor of his establishment and called out through a speaking tube to the janitor or porter in an upper story and said: "Make the gentleman a barrel of 19-year-old whiskey quick; he is in a hurry for it."

Now, Mr. Chairman, I have criticized quite freely the brief of Olwell & Co., because they certainly are interested personally in preventing the imposition of a tax on adulterated whiskey. For myself I desire to say that except in my capacity as a legislator I am in no wise interested in the subject. I never have been and never expect to be interested otherwise in the liquor business.

Often I have heard it said that there was neither a rich distiller nor a poor rectifier.

I shall now read the table to which I referred early in my remarks. The table shows the tax discrimination in favor of adulterated whiskey, at different proofs, as against pure whiskey at the same proof.

[The figures below are based upon the tax on whiskey being $2.20 per proof gallon.]

Kind of whiskey.	Proof.	Tax per gallon.	Discrimination against straight whiskey per gallon.	Tax per 50-gallon barrel.	Discrimination against straight whiskey per 50-gallon barrel.

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Chairman, the committee would like very much to conclude debate upon this title this afternoon, and I again ask unanimous consent that all debate upon this title and all amendments thereto close at 5 o'clock.

Mr. MANN. Make it a specific time for debate.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that all debate upon this title and all amendments thereto close at 5 o'clock. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I always object to fixing a definite hour.

Mr. RAINEY. Then I will say 25 minutes.

Mr. MANN. We can not tell how the time will be occupied. I have no objection to that.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman modifies his request to 25 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, is there an amendment pending?

The CHAIRMAN. There is.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Is that the Howard amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I fully realize that we are in a state of war, and I know that there has got to be a large amount of revenue raised to pay the expenses of carrying on this war, but I for one am not ready to cast my vote to place taxes on an institution which I believe is the greatest enemy to the home, to the church, to the school, to the State, and the Nation that we have to-day in order to raise the revenue to carry on this war. During the last three or four weeks I have received numerous telegrams and petitions from the best people in my district, from the manufacturers' associations, from the school-teachers, from the Christian churches, praying for prohibition of the liquor traffic during this crisis which we as a Nation are passing through at this time. Why, the liquor people want this extra tax placed on distilled spirits. I have telegrams on my desk in my office from the liquor associations in my district saying that they are in favor of this extra $1.10 tax on distilled spirits. Why do they want this? Because they know it will intrench their business more firmly and more solidly with our Government than it ever was before.

Mr. RAINEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. I will.

Mr. RAINEY. I will say that the representatives of all the distillers of the United States here in Washington, on behalf of all of them, protest most vigorously against this increase.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. That may be so, but I have telegrams on my desk from liquor dealers' associations in my district asking that this tax be placed on liquor. Not long ago I received a letter from Mr. Gilmore, president of the Model License League, in reference to this higher tax on liquors. What did he say in that letter? He said that he thought the American boys ought to be filled up full of whisky before they were sent to the front to make a charge and face German bullets.

Mr. SABATH. Has the gentleman that letter here?

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Mr. Gilmore sent me that letter. My God, what a charge is that! What a consolation that is to the Christian fathers and mothers of this great land, that the Government is going to take those boys away from Christian environment, away from their homes, from their fathers and their mothers, and then we have the men who are advocating this tax say, "Fill your boys full of whisky and send them out to charge on the German trenches." If my boy goes to the trenches of Europe and is killed in battle, I do not want him to be filled up with whisky when he draws his last breath. I am opposed to placing this extra tax on liquor because, as I said a few moments ago, it is an institution which is eating at the very heartstrings and undermining the very foundation of our Government, as it were, and it ill becomes this Government to accept money from an institution that is doing more to destroy civilization and eat out the lifeblood of our people than all the other evil institutions in existence to-day. Ah, during the Civil War they advocated such a tax as this. When the great emancipator, Abraham Lincoln, that greatest of all Americans, was asked about placing a tax upon distilled liquor, and he was forced in a way to accept it, what did he say? He said, "I would rather cut off my right arm than place a tax on intoxicating liquors." Ah, gentlemen, we are facing a serious question here. Eighty-five per cent of all the territory of this country is dry—65 per cent of our people live in dry territory. Twenty-six or 27 of the States of this Union have abolished the liquor traffic, and yet Congress is going to place an extra tax of $1.10 on this institution, which is robbing our homes of all the virtue and manhood we have.

Mr. COX. The gentleman will stand by bread instead of booze?

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Yes; every time; and I am going to vote for the Howard amendment, because I am opposed to placing an extra tax on the liquor traffic, which will intrench it more firmly and deeply in our Government. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, we are passing through the greatest crisis in the history of our Nation, and I pray God that we can stand the test as true Americans and go into this war with only one motive in our hearts and minds, and that is that right shall prevail. But I want to plead with you, Members of this Congress, not to form an alliance with the un-American licensed liquor traffic by accepting its blood-stained money in order to carry on this war. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HERSEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maine asks unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. HERSEY. Mr. Chairman, some of us have perhaps forgotten the following in the Washington Times of last evening. The Times had in large headlines—

REVENUE ARGUMENT HOLDS UP PROHIBITION—NO CERTAINTY OF LIQUOR LEGISLATION AT PRESENT SESSION.

And then it further says:

In spite of the fact that prohibition leaders in the Senate and House are saying there will be prohibition legislation this session, it is learned that no certainty of favorable action exists.

The fight for prohibition, or for some form of restriction of the liquor output, has become complicated with the revenue question. Opponents of prohibition, including representatives of brewers and distillers, who are numerous in Washington, are making the most of the argument that the Government would be embarrassed at this time by having a large share of its revenue from liquors cut off.

This argument has caused a number of Members of both Houses to hesitate.

There is only one interest in this Nation that has come before this Congress and its committees and asked to be taxed more than they are taxed to-day, and that is the liquor interest. Members of Congress are swamped with requests from our constituents all over the land opposing the increase of taxation upon the different industries and businesses of the country, but here is one business in this country that is praying to have its taxes increased and not a single request to have them cut down.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Will the gentleman yield for an inquiry?

Mr. HERSEY. I can not yield; I have only 10 minutes.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Can the gentleman supply us with information as to the desire of the liquor dealers that this tax be imposed?

Mr. HERSEY. If you will listen to me, I will explain. The revenue arguments, the taxation of the liquor traffic, the licensing of the brewer and distiller by the imposing of a revenue tax, is the life of the liquor traffic in this Nation to-day. Without this revenue it would die. This Congress, the people of this Nation, nobody, would for one moment favor the liquor traffic; would allow it protection; would allow it life, but for the revenue that the Nation gets from it. The Supreme Court of the United States has decided time and again that no person has a moral right to distill intoxicating liquor, or brew it, or sell it, without the protection of law. And when the United States takes revenue from the saloon, from the brewery, and from the distillery it at the same time says, "We protect you and make your business a lawful industry of the United States; we give you thereby respectability and perpetuity."

Therefore, I say that the saloon, the brewery, and the distillery want to pay large revenues into the National Treasury. The brewers and distillers of this Nation to-day want to be called heroes and martyrs in this war. In the days that are coming, when we ask by some bill in this Congress to have it destroyed—as you will in this Congress—if this revenue bill passes here, with a revenue of $350,000,000 from the brewery and distillery, it will be used in all the arguments against prohibition, and you know it. It is the only argument they have.

Years ago a certain murderer in history had a mark placed upon his forehead, that those seeing him and knowing him could not kill him.

Mr. MEEKER. Will the gentleman yield for information?

Mr. HERSEY. Not to the gentleman from Missouri; no. [Laughter.]

Mr. MEEKER. I just wanted to know why Maine has not a bone-dry law; that is all.

Mr. HERSEY. There is another murderer walking this Nation to-day, and he is asking that the mark be put upon him, that those seeing him will not kill him, and that Cain is the liquor traffic of this Nation, and its saving mark is the tax that we are asked to put upon its forehead to-day.

Thirty-seven States of this Union, my own State among them, have outlawed the liquor traffic; have said by law that the distiller, the brewer, and the liquor seller, are outlaws and criminals. These dry States have some rights in the Congress. We have some rights here to-day when we say we ought not to be required to support or vote for a revenue to carry on this war, that is obtained from this outlawed liquor traffic.

Mr. SABATH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HERSEY. No.

Mr. SABATH. There is a prohibition law in the gentleman's State, is there not?

Mr. HERSEY. You know there is a prohibition law in my State.

Mr. SABATH. I really did not know from what State the gentleman hails. I thought he came from Maine.

Mr. HERSEY. You are right.

Mr. SABATH. There is a prohibition law in the State of Maine, is there not?

Mr. MEEKER. There is no bone-dry law there.

Mr. SABATH. There are a great many places in that State where liquor can be obtained?

Mr. HERSEY. The gentlemen are taking up my time with idle questions.

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. If the gentleman from Maine will yield, I would like to tell the gentleman from Illinois something about Bangor, Me.

Mr. SABATH. I am willing to yield to the gentleman. [Laughter.]

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Regular order, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. I will say to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH] that in the campaign last fall I went to Bangor——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maine declines to yield.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Maine may have five additional minutes, in order that he may proceed with his remarks, and that we may hear from the gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. O'SHAUNESSY] in respect to Bangor, Me.

Mr. HERSEY. Mr. Chairman, I will answer the gentleman who inquires about Bangor, Me. That city is in my district.

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. I was there.

Mr. HERSEY. It is the largest city in my district. I carried the city of Bangor in the primaries.

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. I am glad of it. I want to tell you something. I respect the sincere prohibitionist. I detest hypocrites, and it is time that somebody uttered a word against hypocrisy in this American Congress. I want to say something about Bangor. When I was there I was ashamed to think and realize that in an American city, a prohibition city——

Mr. HERSEY. I object to a speech in my time.

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. Just a minute.

Mr. HERSEY. I yield for a question, but I decline to yield for a speech.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Regular order, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. FOCHT. You are afraid of the truth.

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. Do you believe it is so bad you will not permit me to speak about it?

Mr. HERSEY. The gentleman, without right and against the rules, is using my time in making his speech. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maine will proceed.

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Chairman, I call the gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. O'SHAUNESSY] to order. The gentleman from Maine is making a speech and should be protected on the floor of the House.

Mr. HERSEY. I am talking, gentleman, a matter of pure business. There is no sentiment mixed up in it at all; it is a matter of plain business. This Nation is against the saloon. The people of the United States are opposed to the saloon; they are against the brewer and the distiller. The United States, a Christian, civilized Nation, to-day is not standing with the unlawful, illegal liquor business—the monstrous traffic. I say that as a fact; and this Nation does not desire longer to continue this national curse by saying that this monstrous liquor traffic is to furnish revenue to carry on this war, or that this great, wealthy United States, this prosperous Republic, is dependent upon the saloon to finance this war. [Applause.] I, as a prohibitionist, as one who hates the liquor traffic with an everlasting hatred, stand to-day against the idea that this Nation can not conduct this war unless it gets on its knees to the saloon and says to these drunkard factories, "For all of the suffering, all of the misery and the madness and the death to this Nation caused by this terrible evil we will protect and perpetuate you if you furnish the revenue for carrying on this war."

The ancients had a fabled monster that had the face of a man, but the body and heart of a brute. The present legalized liquor traffic of this Nation is like that monster. In this revenue bill it presents the face of a man; it wants to contribute revenue for a righteous war. Its face is the likeness of a man, but it has no soul, but it has the body and the instincts of the brute. For every dollar it puts into the Treasury it takes thousands from the homes of our land.

Oh, the folly and madness that would claim for a moment that the manufacture and sale of intoxicants is an industry to be recognized, used, and protected by this Nation in its hour of need! These great, rich, powerful drunkard factories, over which floats our flag of protection to-day, ought to be turned into factories of industry that will add to the wealth and prosperity of our people; but by this revenue we are asked to legislate to permit and continue this accursed traffic to take, in a time of war, millions of bushels of the richest grains and most precious fruits God has given us, and to destroy this food as effectually and completely as if cast into the sea.

Gentlemen on this floor attempt to defend this revenue because Maine is not "bone dry." During the past week my State has been flooded with circulars and letters like these:

[H. W. Huguley Co., distillers, the largest mail-order liquor house in the United States, Boston, Mass.]

LIQUOR CAN NOT BE SHIPPED INTO MAINE.

On and after July 1, 1917, no liquor of any kind can be received in Maine for beverage purposes. In the future we can ship you liquor only for medicinal use, and your order must be accompanied by a doctor's prescription on a form similar to one inclosed.

This new Federal law is no joke, as some people seem to think, and the fact remains that anyone ordering or shipping other than for medicinal use is liable to be imprisoned. Therefore take no chances and have your friend the doctor sign an order for you.

Remember the Fourth of July is near. Stock up now. No order can be shipped by us after June 29, except for medicinal use.

H. W. HUGULEY CO.

Nineteen hundred years ago in an ancient city a certain citizen, under the argument that he needed the money, for 30 pieces of silver betrayed his Lord and Master, and when he brought the money to the chief priests and elders and begged them to take it, they said: "It is not lawful for to put this into the treasury, because it is the price of blood."

History repeats itself to-day at this beautiful Capitol of a Christian Nation. "Judas crouches with the silver in his hands." Those who to-day, under the plea "We need the money," betray the people, will to-morrow be hurled from place and power. A long-suffering and patient people will make this Nation sober by saying with those who were offered the revenue of Judas, "It is not lawful for to put this into the Treasury, because it is the price of blood." [Applause.]

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I respect the conscientious views of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. HERSEY], and I do not wish to be understood as in any way attempting to answer him or the argument he has made. It merely happens that I am following him in making the few observations I have to make.

The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HOWARD] is an extremely earnest advocate of prohibition in this Nation, and other gentlemen on this floor have earnestly advocated prohibition. To-day when the gentleman from Georgia was on his feet I took occasion to interrogate him as to the reason why, in view of the increase in prohibition sentiment in the United States, there is an increase in the consumption of whisky. I asked why the internal-revenue receipts from distilled spirits, in view of the contrary claims of the prohibitionists, were $13,000,000 more in 1916 than they were in the year before. I do not ask this question as indicating my sentiments on this question at all. I believe in temperance, in strict temperance. But I wonder, when gentlemen tell us day by day, and vote day by day in favor of what they say is an increasing sentiment in favor of prohibition, that there is an increasing consumption of whisky in this country.

The gentleman from Georgia indicated that it was due to our exports; that it was due to our exports in war times; to our exports in times when we profess that we do not want whisky consumed by the troops of the United States, and when gentlemen on the floor are contending for amendments to prevent American soldiers from obtaining distilled spirits.

The gentleman says the increase in the consumption of liquor is due to our exports. If that be true, then while we pretend to keep liquor from our own soldiers, evidently we are conniving at the sale of liquor to the soldiers of foreign countries. I have taken occasion to look up the statistics in the matter of exports, and I find they are intensely interesting. As a matter of information only, and without regard to sentiment, they ought to be put in the RECORD.

Now, how much liquor did we export to foreign countries from the United States during the year ending June 30, 1916, a war year? I find that we sent to Africa, perhaps the last country in the world to which the United States should send intoxicating liquor, 1,196,000 gallons of rum, and of all spirits a total of 1,200,000 gallons. We sent to Bermuda, which is certainly not a very large community—but evidently we sent it there for reshipment to Great Britain—46,000 gallons of whisky, and of all spirits 55,000 gallons. We sent to England proper 63,000 gallons of whisky and 268,000 gallons of rum, and of all spirits 447,000 gallons. Now we are told that the soldiers in the trenches are not permitted to use liquor and that foreign countries have cut off the supply. Yet we find in the published reports of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue of the United States that this country sent to France in the year quoted 61,000 gallons of rum and 16,259,000 gallons of alcohol, the latter possibly for munition purposes. To France in the aggregate we sent 25,000,000 gallons of distilled liquor, including alcohol. To Mexico, another country in which perhaps we ought not to encourage the liquor traffic, we sent 24,000 gallons of whisky and a total of 33,000 gallons of all kinds of liquor. Did we send it there for the use of our own troops or did we send it there for the purpose of stirring up the hot blood of the Mexican belligerents?

I will not proceed further, except to say that we sent to foreign ports not designated a total of all kinds of liquor of 11,000,000 gallons. We sent to all countries a total of 39,000,000 gallons; and upon all this liquor sent to foreign countries for consumption by foreign peoples the United States Government did not collect one single cent of revenue. There is no tax on exports. Now, these are figures to ponder over.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Chairman, this is a revenue bill, and no section in this bill has been more carefully considered and framed than the section now under discussion. It was the unanimous opinion of the Ways and Means Committee that fermented liquors, distilled liquors, and wines ought to bear every cent they could stand in a bill of this kind, and we framed this title, so far as distilled liquors and fermented liquors and wines are concerned, to yield $420,000,000 of the total amount carried in this bill.

The argument so far has been an argument against saloons. The pending amendment—and it is the only pending amendment—is to strike out of the bill the increases on liquors. We have doubled the tax upon whisky. We have doubled the tax upon wines. We have almost doubled the tax upon fermented liquors. We have done this after carefully examining the taxes placed in the other warring nations of the world. If these proposed increases are stricken out of the bill, then the old rates will stand. If we strike out these increases is that a blow at the saloons of this country? If you strike out these increases does that leave the boys in our armies, wherever they are, with less liquor to drink than now? If you strike out these increases are you helping the saloon keepers and distillers of this country or not? Why, you are lessening the burdens upon them.

Several years ago certain members of the Ways and Means Committee, who are still members of the Ways and Means Committee of this House, stopped the decrease in the tax on liquor by defeating the proposed outage allowances, and from that moment when we succeeded in defeating the proposed additional outage allowances, the decreases in the taxes on liquor, the States of this Union commenced to go dry in fact, and with the passage of the bone-dry proposition in the last session of this Congress the real decrease in the consumption of liquors in this country commenced. The department estimates that during the next fiscal year there will be 158,000,000 gallons of tax-paid liquor withdrawn from the bonded warehouses, but during the succeeding fiscal year, the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, there will be only 120,000,000 gallons of distilled liquor withdrawn from bonded warehouses. If this demon rum has effected all the destruction in the world and in this country claimed for it this afternoon on this floor—and I do not disagree at all in any particular with the arguments used, and I speak now as a man who represents in this House a district almost dry—I say while this war lasts let us compel this hellish traffic to pay for some of the damages it has caused in the past. [Applause.] You will not increase the production of liquor one gallon by taxing it twice as much as it is taxed now. If you make it more expensive, if you make it cost more, less of it will reach the consumer than reaches him now. That is the proposition presented to this House.

Strike out this $420,000,000 and a different question presents itself.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. All time has expired. The question is upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HOWARD].

The question being taken, the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk began the reading of Title IV.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. To what section does the gentleman desire to offer his amendment?

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment striking out all of section 302.

Mr. STAFFORD. I make the point of order, Mr. Chairman, that the amendment comes too late. The Chair has directed the Clerk to read.

Mr. BARKLEY. I was on my feet asking for recognition.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks that the gentleman ought to be permitted to offer his amendment.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Chairman, I have not been able to state my motion in full yet. I desire to move to strike out section 302, and strike out after the word "substance," line 12, page 10, all of that paragraph down to and including line 15, and all of the paragraph down to and including line 7, on page 11, and to insert what I have sent to the desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. BARKLEY moves to strike out section 302 down to and including the word "passed," page 10, line 7. Strike out on page 10, line 12, after the word "substance," the remainder of the paragraph, and on page 10 strike out all of the paragraph beginning on line 16, down to and including line 7, on page 11, and insert the following:

"That from and after the passage of this act there shall be levied and collected on each wine gallon of spirits of less than 100 proof, or fractional part thereof, rectified under the provisions of the third subdivision of section 3244, Revised Statutes, a tax equal to the tax which now is or which hereafter may be imposed by law on spirits withdrawn from internal-revenue bonded warehouses or places of deposit for fruit brandy. In determining the amount of tax on such rectified spirits, however, credit shall be given for the tax theretofore paid when withdrawn from bond on the spirits contained in such rectified spirits: Provided, That after spirits have been withdrawn from rectification and the tax provided by this act has been paid, nothing thereafter can be added to said rectified spirits by the rectifier or other dealer whereby the character of the rectified spirits is changed or the volume of same increased: And provided further, That this act shall not apply to still wines rectified, purified, or refined under the provisions of said section 3244, Revised Statutes. The Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, shall prescribe such rules and regulations as may be necessary for the administration of this law."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kentucky.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BARKLEY) there were 20 ayes and 62 noes.

So the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the Clerk read Title IV through before amendments are offered.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that Title IV may be read through before amendments are offered. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

TITLE IV.—WAR TAX ON CIGARS, TOBACCO, AND MANUFACTURES THEREOF.

SEC. 400. That upon cigars and cigarettes, which shall be manufactured and sold, or removed for consumption or sale, there shall be levied and collected, in addition to the taxes now imposed by existing law, the following taxes, to be paid by the manufacturer or importer thereof: On cigars of all descriptions made of tobacco, or any substitute therefor, and weighing not more than 3 pounds per thousand, 25 cents per thousand; on cigars made of tobacco, or any substitute therefor, and weighing more than 3 pounds per thousand, if manufactured or imported to retail at not more than 4 cents each, 50 cents per thousand; if manufactured or imported to retail at more than 4 cents and not more than 6 cents each, $1 per thousand; if manufactured or imported to retail at more than 6 cents and not more than 10 cents each, $2 per thousand; if manufactured or imported to retail at more than 10 cents and not more than 15 cents each, $4 per thousand; if manufactured or imported to retail at more than 15 cents and not more than 20 cents each, $5 per thousand; if manufactured or imported to retail at more than 20 cents and not more than 25 cents each, $7 per thousand; if manufactured or imported to retail at more than 25 cents each, $10 per thousand: Provided, That the word "retail" as used in this section shall mean the ordinary retail price of a single cigar, and that the Commissioner of Internal Revenue may, by regulation, require the manufacturer to affix to each box or container a conspicuous label indicating the maximum retail price of each cigar, which must correspond with the tax-paid stamp on said box or container; on cigarettes made of tobacco, or any substitute therefor, made in or imported into the United States, and weighing not more than 3 pounds per thousand, $1.25 per thousand.

The Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, shall provide the dies and stamps for cigars and cigarettes necessary under the taxes in effect, and the sizes of packages authorized, after the provisions of this title take effect.

Every manufacturer of cigarettes (including small cigars weighing not more than 3 pounds per thousand) shall put up all the cigarettes and such small cigars that he manufactures or has manufactured for him, and sells or removes for consumption or use, in packages or parcels containing 5, 7, 8, 9, 10, 14, 16, 18, 19, 20, 40, 50, 80, or 100 cigarettes each, and shall securely affix to each of said packages or parcels a suitable stamp denoting the tax thereon and shall properly cancel the same prior to such sale or removal for consumption or use under such regulations as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, shall prescribe; and all cigarettes imported from a foreign country shall be packed, stamped, and the stamps canceled in a like manner, in addition to the import stamp indicating inspection of the customhouse before they are withdrawn therefrom.

SEC. 401. SEC. 402. That so much of section 400 as imposes a tax upon cigars and the whole of section 401 shall take effect 30 days after the passage of this act. That section 404 and so much of section 400 as imposes a tax upon cigarettes and as relates to packages or parcels in which cigarettes may be put up shall take effect 90 days after the passage of this act: Provided, That after the passage of this act and before the expiration of the aforesaid 90 days, cigarettes may be put up in the packages now provided for by law or in the packages provided for in section 400.

SEC. 403. That there shall also be assessed and collected upon all manufactured tobacco and snuff in excess of 1,000 pounds or upon cigars or cigarettes in excess of 20,000, which were manufactured or imported and removed from factory or customhouse prior to the passage of this act bearing tax-paid stamps affixed to such articles for the payment of the taxes thereon, and which are, on the day this act is passed, held and intended for sale by any person, corporation, partnership, or association, and upon all manufactured tobacco, snuff, cigars, or cigarettes removed from factory or customhouse after the passage of this act but prior to the time when the tax imposed by section 400 or section 401 upon such articles takes effect, an additional tax equal to one-half the tax imposed by such sections upon such articles.

SEC. 404. That there shall be levied and collected upon the making up of cigarette paper into packages, books, sets, or tubes, intended for use by the smoker in making cigarettes, the following taxes: On each package, book, or set, containing not more than 25 papers, one-fourth of 1 cent; containing more than 25 but not more than 50 papers, one-half of 1 cent; containing more than 50 but not more than 100 papers, 1 cent; containing more than 100 papers, 1 cent for each 100 papers or fractional part thereof; and upon tubes, 2 cents for each 100 tubes or fractional part thereof. Such tax shall be paid by stamps affixed by the person, corporation, partnership, or association making up such package, book, set, or tube.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I have some committee amendments which I wish to offer.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 19, line 10, strike out the words "the making up" and, after the word "paper," insert the words "made up."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KITCHIN. I also offer the further committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 19, line 11, before the word "intended," insert the words "made up or imported into the United States and."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KITCHIN. I also offer the following committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 19, line 21, after the word "up," insert the words "or importing."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate be closed on this title and all amendments thereto in 20 minutes.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Oh, I hope the gentleman will not insist on that.

Mr. KITCHIN. Twenty-five minutes, then.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The gentleman ought not to undertake to shut off debate on this important paragraph.

Mr. KITCHIN. How much time does the gentleman want?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Ten minutes.

Mr. KINCHELOE. I want 10 minutes.

Mr. FIELDS. I want five minutes.

Mr. BARKLEY. I want some time.

Mr. KITCHIN. How much time does the gentleman want?

Mr. BARKLEY. I think I can get along with 20 minutes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I want five minutes for my colleague [Mr. PORTER].

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this title and amendments thereto close in 35 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that all debate on Title IV and amendments thereto be closed in 35 minutes.

Mr. MADDEN. Reserving the right to object, I would like to ask if the gentleman intends to have a vote on this to-night?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes; and I hope to read the next title and then stop without considering it.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, if I may be permitted in my time, I desire to yield to the gentleman from Florida [Mr. CLARK] for the purpose of having a telegram read.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Chairman, I send a telegram to the Clerk's desk, which I desire to have read.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

OCALA, FLA., May 17, 1917.

Hon. FRANK CLARK,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.:

In regard to war taxes, sentiment in this community is that they had better be left to the judgment of Congress. Your constituents in Marion County are willing to do their share of the fighting and the paying.

OCALA EVENING STAR.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, if there is no objection, I would like now to yield for a moment to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. VARE] in order that he may make a request for unanimous consent.

Mr. VARE. Mr. Chairman, I desire to call the attention of the House at this time to a condition existing in the National Guard now being quartered near Pittsburgh. Many members of the Third Regiment of Philadelphia, in my district, are lying seriously ill, because of eating poisoned food. A lieutenant is about to be brought home dead. I call attention to this not as a matter of criticism in connection with the regulations of the Army, but it does seem to me that while we have been talking preparedness for these many months there ought to be some system whereby young men, who enlist and who are willing to fight for their country, are so protected that they are not made sick or killed through the use of poisoned food. I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing therein a newspaper article concerning this.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD in the manner stated. Is there objection?

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I do not wish the insinuation to go out against the department. This poisoning, as I understand it, occurred in a private restaurant, where some of these boys unfortunately went and ate a meal. It was not within the control or jurisdiction of the department.

Mr. VARE. It is of that very thing that I complain.

My opinion is that some provision should be made by which the food served to soldiers would be supervised in the making by Government authority, that cases of this nature will not occur again. Some precaution should be taken by the Government. I do not wish to criticize the Army or insinuate anything against its management, but I do feel that the reoccurrence of this tragedy would be a reflection upon the authorities, and that some attention should be called to it at this time.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The article from the Philadelphia North American referred to is as follows:

PITTSBURGH, May 17.

Developments to-day led police and detectives, together with military authorities, to increase their efforts to solve the mystery of the poisoning of Philadelphia National Guardsmen, on duty at Port Perry and Duquesne, causing the death of Lieut. William F. Corcoran and the illness of 41 others.

Late to-night Mrs. Helen Shipley, the cook who prepared the meals eaten by the soldiers, was found unconscious in the restaurant and was hurried to the Braddock hospital suffering from a poison, self-administered. The police say they believe she attempted suicide. She probably will recover.

Only 10 men out of the 51 in Company C, Third Pennsylvania Infantry, escaped. Sixteen of those stricken are in a serious condition.

From half a dozen ends, with information from reliable sources in their possession, the detectives and military authorities were working to-night in the belief that Germans were at the root of the crime and that money changed hands in the plot.

That the food eaten by the guardsmen in the Miller restaurant at Port Perry is directly responsible for the death of Lieut. Corcoran and the illness of the others was not doubted. Although the analysis of Corcoran's stomach will not be completed for 10 days, all physicians connected with the cases believed a "violent" poison was used. Coroner's Physician Schildecker declared to-day that it was not ptomaine which caused death.

Satisfied that strichnia or a similar poison was placed in pudding served the soldiers at their dining place, County Detectives Burke and Weber and Maj. George Blair and Maj. J. W. Foos spent part of the day subjecting Carl Miller, proprietor of the restaurant, and several of his employees and guests to a cross-examination. No person has been permitted to leave the premises since the men were poisoned.

Since yesterday inmates of the establishment have virtually been prisoners, but not with charges against them.

Following is list of those seriously affected by the poison:

Braddock General Hospital—Ernest Wolfelt, Joseph Redding, Louis Bonaventura, Tony Gaiardi, John Gibson, Edward Brenlinger, Edward Boyle, Benjamin Knight, Arthur McCormick, George McCuster, and H. C. Pugh, all privates.

West Penn Hospital—Harry Walwrath, corporal; M. Gratz, private.

Ill in camp—Joseph Koch, sergeant; C. H. Thomas, private; and John Mink, private.

A detail of soldiers with the body of Lieut. Corcoran will leave for Philadelphia on a Pennsylvania Railroad train at 1 o'clock to-morrow afternoon.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I ask the attention of the gentleman from North Carolina to the first section of the tobacco title. This section perhaps is as scientifically drawn as any other section in the bill. It was reported with substantial unanimity, was it not?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes. I will say to the gentleman that some of us thought some of those rates were very high, but it was finally decided by an overwhelming majority that they were the correct rates and the committee was unanimous.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I wanted to get it into the RECORD that the committee decided to report this graduated scale of taxes on manufactured cigars after careful consideration.

Mr. KITCHIN. Most careful consideration.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. May I ask the gentleman this, to answer numerous correspondence in my State with respect to this graduated scale: Will the chairman of the committee accept any amendment to this scale at this time?

Mr. KITCHIN. I do not think any amendment ought to be offered to reduce the taxes on cigars.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. If any attempt is made to modify the scale as presented in the title, as I understand it, it would tend to disorganize the financial arrangement of the bill.

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes. I could not accept any amendment.

Mr. FIELDS. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 17, line 23, after the word "to," insert the words "one-half."

Mr. FIELDS. Mr. Chairman, the object of this amendment is to increase the taxes on tobacco 50 per cent under this bill instead of 100 per cent, as provided in the bill. Many of the tobacco growers of the country, especially of the Burley districts, believe that an increase of 100 per cent in the taxes that are now imposed on tobacco will affect the consumption of the Burley product to such an extent that it will not only produce less revenue than a 50 per cent increase would produce, but that it will also affect the producers themselves, first, by decreasing consumption, and second, by causing the Tobacco Trusts to use this very heavy tax as a leverage to force down prices paid to the farmers who produce the tobacco.

Mr. Chairman, few men in this body know what a struggle the tobacco growers have had in recent years to raise the price of their product to a fair and a living price. They were forced to battle with one of the strongest monopolies in the country, and their struggle was all the harder because of the small percentage of the total area of the country that produces tobacco and the small percentage of the total population engaged in its production. But the producers of tobacco, though few in numbers when compared with those engaged in other industries which produce less revenue than does the tobacco industry, won in their fight with the Tobacco Trust and are now receiving a fair price for their product; and I sincerely trust that the Congress may not enact legislation so rigid and so arbitrary that it will give the Tobacco Trust an advantage of the producer which will enable the former to force prices back to the low-water mark that the farmers were forced to submit to for so many years.

I venture the assertion, and do it without fear of successful contradiction, that no other legitimate industry in the country produces as much revenue to the Government on the amount of money invested or the amount of labor employed as does the tobacco industry. For the fiscal year ending June 30, 1916, the Government collected $88,063,974.51 internal revenue on tobacco and tobacco products; and, of course, an increase in the tax on tobacco will increase the amount collected, until the tax becomes prohibitive, and if that occurs it will naturally decrease the total collection, thereby injuring both the Government and the producer.

It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that the increase of 100 per cent on this product may directly affect consumption, thereby affecting the producers of this product. The tobacco growers of the country are willing to bear their share of the taxes necessary to support the Government in this crisis, but if the tax imposed works a hardship upon them by decreasing consumption it will naturally disorganize their affairs, demoralize their business, and injure the Government. Some may say before the close of this debate that this land had better be cultivated in corn or in food products, and I realize the force of that argument with those who do not understand conditions in the tobacco-producing sections of the country. Yet we must not paralyze the agricultural industry of this country, and through the tobacco districts the farmers have so adjusted their affairs that if you demoralize the tobacco industry you naturally affect the whole agricultural industry of those sections, and through fear that this increase of 100 per cent in the tobacco tax may have such an effect upon producers of the country in one of their main staple products I offer this amendment and hope that it may be adopted.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Mr. Chairman, I wish to offer the following as a substitute for the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kentucky.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Substitute offered by Mr. KINCHELOE for the amendment offered by Mr. FIELDS: On page 17, in line 23, after the word "to," insert the words "40 per cent of."

Mr. KINCHELOE. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House of Representatives, I realize this country is now in the most gigantic and stupendous war in the history of the world. I further realize that in order to prosecute this war effectively it is necessary to have money. I believe in collecting enough revenue from the people necessary to prosecute this war, but I want to see everybody in this country bear his just proportion of these taxes and to pay according to his ability.

I fully appreciate the fact that thousands of the young manhood of this country will be called upon to go upon the battle fields and sacrifice, if necessary, their lives in defense of our great country, and no one has a greater admiration for these patriots than I. I want to see this Government raise enough revenue to provide comfortably for these gallant young men. I am sure when they go they will take the sympathy and admiration of every patriotic American, and I believe every patriotic citizen is willing to bear his just proportion of the burden of taxes incident to this war.

I have offered an amendment to the provision of the revenue bill offered by the Ways and Means Committee, and now pending before the House, providing for an additional tax of 100 per cent on manufactured tobacco and snuff. My amendment seeks to reduce this to a 40 per cent additional tax. I did this for two reasons: First, in the interest of the tobacco growers of my district and State; and, second, because I believe an increase of only 40 per cent on manufactured tobacco and snuff will yield more revenue to the Government than a tax of 100 per cent increase.

The tobacco growers of the "black patch" of Kentucky are as patriotic and loyal to our flag as any other people in the world, and they will be just as willing to bear their just proportions of the burdens of this war in taxes as any other class of people in this country.

It is true that tobacco is a luxury, and I heard the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH] say, in his address to you, that practically all of these taxes would be paid by the consumers, and the only way to raise this revenue was to put the tax on the manufacturers and "pass it on" to the consumers.

Gentlemen, there is a vast difference, in my opinion, between compelling the consumers of the necessaries of life to pay the taxes than in compelling the consumers of the luxuries of life to pay them. Of course, the consumers of the necessaries of life have to pay the taxes, because they are compelled to use the commodities so taxed, but the consumers of the luxuries of life are not compelled to pay the taxes, because they are not compelled to use those luxuries. I wish I could be led to believe that the consumers of the manufactured tobacco would pay all of this proposed 100 per cent increase—and I am a pretty good customer of this article myself. If I conscientiously thought so, I would not raise a protest against paying it, because it is a luxury and not a necessity. In my opinion, if this 100 per cent increase on manufactured tobacco and snuff is written into the law the major portion of this burden will not be paid by the consumers of the manufactured tobacco and snuff, will not be paid by the manufacturers themselves, but will fall back upon the shoulders of the tobacco growers.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KINCHELOE. For a short question.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Is it not a fact that the tobacco raised in the gentleman's section and mine is practically all export tobacco?

Mr. KINCHELOE. Not all; the major portion of it is; yes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Well, 95 per cent, is it not?

Mr. KINCHELOE. No; about 80 per cent. But the point I make is this: When the American Tobacco Co. and the Imperial Tobacco Co. come to buy the tobacco in our districts next fall, with this 100 per cent increased tax on manufactured tobacco, they will say to the grower, "We would like to pay you more for this tobacco, but we are unable to do so by reason of the 100 per cent increased tax placed on the manufactured tobacco by Congress." Therefore they will probably be able to buy it cheaper by reason of this excuse.

Some members of the Ways and Means Committee have said that the manufacturers of tobacco will pay this tax by making the plugs thinner and smaller. They may do this to some extent, but I want to say to the Members of this House who represent tobacco districts, do not find any consolation in the proposition that the manufacturer will pay this tax and that the tobacco grower will not pay any of it. The tobacco trusts will go to the growers and say, in view of this enormous tax placed upon manufactured tobacco they can not pay to the growers the prices they have heretofore gotten, because of this tax, and the result will be, in markets where there is no competition, that the tobacco grower will pay more than his proportion of this tax by receiving a smaller price for his tobacco.

I am sure that a great majority of the Members of this House are not familiar with the hardships and deprivations through which the tobacco growers of the "Black Patch" of Kentucky have gone in years past. There has not been a year since I was born, except last year, that the tobacco growers of the dark tobacco in Kentucky have made a profit on their crop, but have only made a scant living, and part of the years did not do that. The tobacco tenant in the tobacco fields of Kentucky does more work and receives less pay than any other American laborer.

Under existing law there is already a tax of 8 cents per pound upon manufactured tobacco, and yet last year, which, as I have said, is the year in which the tobacco growers of the dark tobacco got more than ever before, they received only an average of about 11 cents per pound for their tobacco. So if this 100 per cent increase of taxes on the manufactured production becomes a law, then the Government will be collecting the exorbitant price of 16 cents per pound for every pound of tobacco manufactured. The result will be, the tax will be so high that the consumption of manufactured tobacco will be decreased to such an extent that the Government will not receive as much revenue as it would if my amendment increasing it to 40 per cent is adopted.

This is also true of cigars and cigarettes. The Ways and Means Committee knows that the 100 per cent increase proposed in this bill will not double the revenue on these articles. Their estimate, shown in their report, shows they do not think so. Let us see what the facts are.

In 1909 the Federal Congress put a tax on manufactured tobacco and snuff and on cigars and cigarettes, as follows:

Cigars weighing more than 3 pounds per 1,000 ------ per 1,000 --	$3.00
Cigars weighing not more than 3 pounds per 1,000 ------ do ----	.75
Cigarettes weighing more than 3 pounds per 1,000 ------ do ----	3.60
Cigarettes weighing not more than 3 pounds per 1,000 ---- do ----	1.25
Tobacco and snuff, however prepared, manufactured, and sold, per pound ----------	.08

In 1916 the internal revenue derived from these products amounted to $85,324,094.46. The Ways and Means Committee proposes to increase the tax upon tobacco, snuff, and cigarettes 100 per cent, and on cigars over 100 per cent; and yet they estimate that this enormous increase will only bring $68,200,000 revenue, which will lack $17,124,094 of bringing as much again revenue as it did in 1916. If their estimates are correct, then they admit that there will not be as much of these products sold as there was under the old law. My contention is, if you place this additional tax on manufactured tobacco and snuff at only 40 per cent, it will bring as much revenue as if the additional tax was 100 per cent.

Mr. DUPRÉ. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KINCHELOE. Just for a question.

Mr. DUPRÉ. I have been informed that the increased tax on cigars and cigarettes during the Spanish-American War resulted in an absolute diminution of revenue to the Government during that period.

Mr. KINCHELOE. I have not investigated this proposition, and therefore am unable to answer the gentleman's question.

Mr. KITCHIN. Will the gentleman permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. KINCHELOE. Just for a question.

Mr. KITCHIN. The gentleman [Mr. DUPRÉ] is mistaken about that. At the beginning of the Spanish-American War the tax on tobacco produced only $36,000,000 of revenue. Immediately after the tax went up to $52,000,000, and then to $59,000,000, and then to $62,000,000, and when we repealed it, it went back to $43,000,000 and $44,000,000. There was a large increase, more than 50 per cent, in the revenue. I am referring to the statistics which I have from the Treasury Department.

Mr. KINCHELOE. I do not want any more of my time taken.

Mr. KITCHIN. I am quoting from statistics from the Treasury Department, which I have here before me.

Mr. KINCHELOE. I am not undertaking to say what happened in the Spanish-American War. I know in 1916 the taxes on tobacco, cigars, cigarettes, and snuff amounted to $85,324,094.46, and now the estimate of your committee is that you propose to increase the taxes and yield only $68,200,000, which will be $17,124,094 less than the 100 per cent increase.

As I have said, the tobacco grower is willing to pay his just proportion of the taxes necessary for the victorious prosecution of this war, and if you will adopt my amendment, which increases the tax on manufactured tobacco 40 per cent, every patriotic tobacco grower in Kentucky will be ready to stand his just proportion of this burden.

I have heard several members of this great Ways and Means Committee say, when asked why a certain tax is placed upon a given article, that it was placed at this figure because "we need the money." I submit this is not a fair nor an intelligent answer. This money can be raised by placing an equitable tax upon the various businesses and enterprises, and no tax should be so high upon any article that it would ruin or even hurt the business. If you place an exorbitant tax upon any article, as I think is proposed in this bill upon manufactured tobacco, then you will not only not receive the revenue that you expect to get, but at the same time you will be hurting a legitimate business, and I submit to you that an additional 8 cents per pound tax upon manufactured tobacco that is already paying 8 cents per pound will not only be exorbitant but will be an unjust burden, the larger part of which is bound to fall back upon the tobacco growers by receiving a less price for their tobacco. Let's not kill the "fowl" that lays the golden eggs.

If there is a set of laborers in this country who should receive a just return for their labor, it is the tobacco growers. It is a commodity that demands the best soil a farmer has, and a crop that is on hand 12 months out of the year.

The tobacco growers of Kentucky have always borne uncomplainingly and willingly their burden of every war this country has had, both in bearing the just proportion of taxes incident to same and by their service upon every battle field.

In the Civil War Kentucky produced her full proportion of volunteers, both to the North and to the South, and in the war of 1812, under "Hickory" Jackson at New Orleans her sons contributed to that victory as much or more than any other State in the Union. Kentucky is willing and ready to-day to furnish her just proportion, and when she does they will cover themselves with glory upon any battle field upon which they participate.

In the interest of the tobacco-growing industry of my State, in the interest of the brave, loyal, and industrious tobacco growers of my district and State, I appeal to this House to adopt this amendment by increasing the tax on manufactured tobacco only 40 per cent. [Loud and continuous applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS] is recognized.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I hope the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. KINCHELOE] will be adopted. When the present tax burden borne by tobacco is considered I do not believe that the tax on manufactured tobacco ought to be increased in any amount, because it is already sufficiently high. Even the present tax is exceedingly high as compared with the tax levied on practically every other object of taxation in this bill. Every one realizes that we have got to raise an enormous amount of revenue to meet the expenses of this war. Everybody will have to make sacrifices, and none will do so more willingly than those whom I have the honor to represent. The people of my section are patriotic and are entirely willing to pay additional taxes during this war to meet the extraordinary expenses of the Government. If the Committee on Ways and Means had proposed to increase the present tax only 50 instead of 100 per cent, as is proposed in this bill, then there would have been no protest, although this product, as I have said, is already bearing its full share of the tax burdens.

I am aware of the fact that the Committee on Ways and Means regards this as a consumption tax, a tax which may be passed on the consumer, and if that were true, I possibly would have nothing to say in opposition to it. But as the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. KINCHELOE] has said, this tax will not be altogether passed on to the consumer, but it will be also levied on the producer, the grower of tobacco——

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. By paying him less for it——

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes; by paying him less for it, as the gentleman from Kentucky well says; less for it in the barn and on the farm. This increased tax will be used as an excuse for bearing down the price of his product when they come to buy it.

Now, that is no pipe dream. It is an opinion founded on the experience that the growers of tobacco have had in the past, and there is not any one in the tobacco-growing region who does not realize the fact that if this Congress undertakes to double the tax on manufactured tobacco, next fall and next spring, when the buyer goes into the field for the purpose of buying the product, the fact that Congress has largely increased the tax will be cited as a reason why a greater price can not be paid for it. That is borne out by the telegrams that I have received, some of which I wish to read to the committee. I read a telegram received from the Clarksville Chamber of Commerce, as follows:

CLARKSVILLE, TENN., May 14, 1917.

Hon. J. W. BYRNS,
Washington, D. C.:

The Chamber of Commerce of Clarksville, Tenn., the most important tobacco market, wishes to enter a vigorous protest against the proposed hundred per cent increase tax on manufactured tobacco, knowing it will eventually fall with great injury on the tobacco producer who is now meagerly paid for the production of the crop and on whom the final blow may prohibit its production. In our judgment an advance of 4 cents per pound the trade would not be seriously inconvenienced while the proposed hundred per cent increase may be prohibitive from a revenue-raising standpoint. It is our judgment more revenue would be produced from a 12-cent tax than a 16-cent tax. We request your effort to limit this tax to not over 4 cents per pound additional.

CLARKSVILLE CHAMBER OF COMMERCE.

I have another telegram here from the Clarksville Tobacco Board, as follows:

CLARKSVILLE, TENN., May 17, 1917.

Hon. JOSEPH W. BYRNS,
Washington, D. C.:

We protest against proposed hundred per cent increase tax on manufactured tobacco, believing it would decrease consumption, thereby interfering with the sale of tobacco by the producer. Consider it patriotic duty of all interests to assist in raising revenue and that 50 per cent increase on tobacco is all it can stand without injury.

CLARKSVILLE TOBACCO BOARD.

Here is another telegram from the Springfield (Tenn.) Tobacco Board:

SPRINGFIELD, TENN., May 11, 1917.

JOSEPH W. BYRNS,
Washington, D. C.:

The Springfield Tobacco Board of Trade suggests 50 per cent increase on tobacco instead of 100, as either will be detrimental to the tobacco growers on account of shipping conditions.

E. R. BEACH, Secretary.

I wish to appeal to this committee, in the interest not so much of the consumer of manufactured tobacco or of the manufacturer of tobacco but particularly in the interest of the thousands of farmers in Tennessee and Kentucky and in those other States which grow tobacco, not to double the already large tax now borne by this product in a manufactured state.

The revenue received from manufactured tobacco in all its forms amounts now to over $88,000,000 a year to this Government. During all the years since the Civil War an immense amount of revenue has been collected from this source, amounting in the aggregate to billions of dollars. Then why double the tax at this time? Does anyone doubt but that the producer may be compelled to bear a portion of the increased burden along with the consumer? Either one or both of these classes must pay it, and it is in behalf of the producer that I am appealing now. As the Clarksville Tobacco Board states, all of the tobacco interests are patriotic. They are more than willing to bear their share of the burdens of this war. But, gentlemen, I submit that under all the circumstances, when you have put a 100 per cent increase of tax on this product you have placed upon their backs a greater burden than you are placing upon the backs of all the other classes of citizens in this country.

I speak also in behalf of the smaller manufacturer. I hold in my hand a letter from the Independence Snuff Co., of Nashville, Tenn., an independent concern, which the large organizations have never been able to induce to enter their combination. This concern writes me that if the tax is increased upon snuff, as this bill proposes, then it will be almost necessary for the smaller concerns to go out of business. The larger companies would doubtless be able to stand the increased cost of tin cans, labels, freight rates, and so forth, because of their ability to command large capital, but not so with the little fellow, who would find that all of his present labels, cans, and so forth, was a dead loss. If this tax therefore is to be levied some time ought to be given before it is to go into effect. But you propose to make it even worse on the manufacturer by imposing a retroactive tax of 50 per cent on tobacco now in his hands. History shows the truth of my assertion. The Spanish War tax of 1898 raised the tax on manufactured tobacco from 6 to 12 cents. Prior to that time the American Tobacco Co. had waged a relentless war against the independent manufacturer, but it had not been able to force them to sell out. But within 60 days after that tax of 12 cents per pound went into effect two large independent concerns sold out, and probably 100 factories had been bought up and a great number of them closed when the Government began its prosecution against the trust in 1905. It is well known what effect this had upon the price of tobacco in the hands of the grower, and I have not the time to go into that now.

In 1902 the tax was reduced to 6 cents, where it remained until 1909 when it was increased to 8 cents, but time was given to meet that increase, because it did not go into effect until July 1, 1910; but it was the small manufacturer who suffered by the increase, rather than the large manufacturer who had the capital to tide him over.

Mr. Chairman, the Government does not seek to levy such a tax on the manufactured product of any other great staple of the farms of this country. More than 90,000 acres of land in my State are devoted to the growing of tobacco, a great portion of it being in the district I represent. It is true that about 80 per cent of this tobacco is exported, but when you consider that nearly 75,000,000 pounds are produced in that State alone, you will see that much of it is used in this country also, being manufactured into smoking tobacco, snuff, and other products. If a part of it is overburdened, then it will undoubtedly have an effect on the whole, so I appeal to Congress to adopt the amendment providing for an increase of 50 per cent, rather than 100 per cent, as proposed by the committee, and, aside from the reasons given, let me tell you that it may prove good business from the standpoint of raising revenue to do so, for, as the telegrams I have read you indicate, if you double this tax, you may bring about the result of decreasing rather than increasing the revenue derived from this source.

Mr. Chairman, I believe that the big capital of the country should be made to bear the greater part of the burdens of this war. The young men are to be drafted into the service of their country and will freely give their lives if need be in its defense. It is as little, therefore, as the large capital interests should expect when it is called upon to finance the war. We have increased the tax to be levied on the larger incomes over that recommended by the committee, so that as the bill now stands several hundreds of millions will be derived over and above the sum contemplated by the committee. We can therefore safely adopt this amendment providing for a 12-cent tax on manufactured tobacco, which is all that was levied in the Spanish-American War. The committee proposes 16 cents. A reduction to 12 cents involves only $15,000,000, whereas by the action of the House in increasing the tax on the larger incomes we have many times taken care of this comparatively small reduction. We certainly ought not to take a chance on adding to the burden of thousands of tobacco growers, something no one is attempting to do with the growers of cotton or any other agricultural product. This Government is too large, too sound, and too wealthy to take action at the very beginning of the war which might work a great hardship and injury to either the manufacturer or the grower of this great and valuable product of our country.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House, I rise for the purpose of supporting either the amendment offered by my colleague Mr. FIELDS or my colleague Mr. KINCHELOE, one being to reduce the increase to 50 per cent and the other to 40 per cent of the present tax instead of the 100 per cent provided in the bill. I really think that the amendment providing for 50 per cent increase ought to be adopted.

I have received numerous telegrams and letters from the farmers of my district stating that they are willing to bear an increase of 50 per cent, but that they believe the 100 per cent increase is unjust, and I hope to be able within a few minutes to convince you of the fact that they are right.

A few years ago the American Tobacco Co., known as the American Tobacco Trust, was the only buyer of tobacco from the grower in the United States. They marked off the territory in such a way that there was only one buyer who ever called upon a farmer for his tobacco. They marked it off by lines just as completely as a county is marked, and a buyer was sent into a certain territory with instructions not to go on the other side of the road to offer a price for tobacco.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. One man worked one side of the road and the other worked the other side of the road.

Mr. BARKLEY. One man worked one side of the road and the other man worked the other side of the road, each remaining on his own side, and there was no competition in the price paid the farmer for his tobacco. In order to combat that condition the farmers organized into an association and agreed to hold their tobacco until they could receive a living price for it, and it has only been in the last three or four years that the farmers who produce tobacco have been able to receive for it as much as it cost them to produce the crop.

Not only was that true, but the American Tobacco Co. drove out practically every small independent tobacco manufacturer in the United States. They would go into a community and undersell the product of the little man, and they continued it until he was compelled to sell out to the trust, and both as a purchaser and as a seller of tobacco the American Tobacco Trust was the only purchaser and seller, and there was no competition either in purchasing or selling.

Mr. BORLAND. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARKLEY. For a brief question.

Mr. BORLAND. Was not that because tobacco is all sold on a cash market, and you have no future or tobacco exchange purchasers of tobacco?

Mr. BARKLEY. No; that condition was not brought about by that fact. Now, for the last two or three years the farmers of Kentucky and Tennessee and other States have been able to get a reasonable price for their tobacco, and small, independent manufacturers have grown up in the community who are now just able to make a living and stay on their feet until they can procure a market for their tobacco. The law already fixes a tax on tobacco of 8 cents a pound, and that is more than the average price that the farmer gets for his tobacco. The present tax is already higher than the farmer gets for his tobacco after having, as we frequently say down in Kentucky, frequently labored 13 months out of 12 in producing his crop.

The Ways and Means Committee have proposed to increase that tax to 16 cents a pound, which is more than twice as much as the farmer gets for his tobacco. If this tax could all be passed on to the man who smokes a pipe or a cigar or a cigarette, I would not object to that, but the buyer offers this as an excuse for reducing the price to the tobacco farmer; and I can well imagine that a tobacco buyer, riding up to a farmer's barn, would say, "Well, I will have to reduce the price of your tobacco from 7 cents down to 6 cents, or from 9 cents down to 7 cents, because they have put 8 cents a pound additional on the price of the manufactured product," if he happens to manufacture it into smoking tobacco or chewing tobacco or sells to a manufacturer. So, my friends, while of course it is impossible to put all this 8-cent tax back on the farmer—because if you did that the farmer would have to pay a premium to get somebody to take the tobacco off his hands—yet it is true that it will offer an excuse to take out of the farmer's price as much as possible and compel him to go back to the situation where he may have to sell his crop for less than it cost him to make it. So I think the farmers of Kentucky and Tennessee have displayed a patriotic spirit when they say they are willing that the tax should be 12 cents a pound on manufactured tobacco, but 16 cents a pound is too much. It is put at a point where some members of the Ways and Means Committee believe it is at the vanishing point of revenue, and it will work a hardship on the men who have spent their time and labor and the preparation of their farms and equipment for the production of tobacco. I trust the amendment reducing the increase to 50 per cent of the present tax, instead of 100 per cent, will be adopted. [Applause.]

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, is all time exhausted?

The CHAIRMAN. There are five minutes remaining, which the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] reserved for his colleague.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, if I may be permitted, I will yield three minutes of that time to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I have listened to the remarks of the gentleman from Tennessee and the gentleman from Kentucky. This is a contest whether it shall be 12 cents or 16 cents a pound on tobacco. You concede 12 cents but do not concede 16. Let us look into this tobacco proposition a little mite. The tariff on tobacco that goes into cigars, where it is imported, pays 25 or 30 cents a pound and an ad valorem. But the tax on the cigar that is made anywhere that is imported into the United States pays $4 a pound and 25 per cent ad valorem. Well, that great tax does not decrease the importations of tobacco; it is charged over on the men that consume the tobacco.

Mr. BARKLEY. I want to call the gentleman's attention to the fact that the proportionate price on tobacco per pound of imported and cigars is more than on the price for the American-grown tobacco manufactured in the United States. So that is hardly a fair comparison.

Mr. CANNON. I suppose during my lifetime I have contributed more thousands of dollars for chewing tobacco until I was 40 years old, and smoking tobacco since, than most Members have contributed, and, whether it was 16 cents or 12 cents, we will take it all the same until after prohibition is universal, as far as liquor is concerned, and then perhaps the people who do not chew or smoke may have prohibition so far as the product of tobacco is concerned in Tennessee and other Southern States, and perhaps in some of our Northern States. It is the one tax that I believe under any and all conditions is charged over on the consumer.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I yield back the time that I reserved for my colleague from Pennsylvania.

Mr. SEARS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes in order to offer an amendment extending the time for the tax on cigars to 60 days.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman can not offer his amendment until the two pending amendments are disposed of. The first question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. SEARS. After the amendments are disposed of, may I have two minutes?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Florida will be recognized after the amendments are disposed of. The question is on the substitute offered by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. KINCHELOE].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. KINCHELOE) there were—ayes 12, noes 54.

So the substitute was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. FIELDS].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. SEARS. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 18, line 10, after the word "effect," strike out the word "thirty" and insert the word "sixty."

Mr. SEARS. Mr. Chairman, I desire to call the attention of the House to the fact that hundreds of thousands of dollars are invested by the cigar-manufacturing companies in tobacco and thousands of people are earning their living by making cigars. In this section 90 days are given to the cigarette manufacturer before the law goes into effect. I understand the sole purpose of giving them that time is to adjust and reduce the containers in order that the people may pay the freight. I ask, therefore, in this amendment that the cigar manufacturers be given 60 days before the law goes into effect in order that they may change their method, if that is going to be the way. I really feel they should be allowed time to rearrange their business. They bought the tobacco under the old-time rates and wages and they ought to be given 60 days in which to arrange their business to meet this tax. I can not hope to argue this question in two minutes, and will therefore only again call your attention to what at least appears to me to be an unfair discrimination in favor of cigarettes.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Florida.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

On lines 21 and 22, page 18, section 403, strike out the words "one thousand" and the words "twenty thousand," respectively, and substitute therefor, respectively, the words "fifty" and "one thousand," so that the section shall read:

"SEC. 403. That there shall also be assessed and collected upon all manufactured tobacco and snuff in excess of 50 pounds or upon cigars or cigarettes in excess of 1,000, which were manufactured or imported and removed from factory or customhouse prior to the passage of this act, bearing tax-paid stamps affixed to such articles for the payment of the tax thereon, and which are on the day this act is passed held and intended for sale by any person, corporation, partnership, or association, and upon all manufactured tobacco, snuff, cigars, or cigarettes removed from factory or customhouse after the passage of this act, but prior to the time when the tax is imposed by section 400 or section 401 upon such articles takes effect, an additional tax equal to one-half the tax imposed by such sections upon such articles."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. SEARS. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 18, line 14, strike out "90" and insert "60."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Florida.

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

TITLE V.—WAR TAX ON FACILITIES FURNISHED BY PUBLIC UTILITIES, ADVERTISING, AND INSURANCE.

SEC. 500. That from and after the 1st day of June, 1917, there shall be levied assessed, collected, and paid (a) a tax equivalent to 3 per cent of the amount paid for the transportation by rail or water of property by freight consigned from one point in the United States to another; (b) a tax equivalent to 10 per cent of the amount paid for the transportation of property by express companies consigned from one point in the United States to another; (c) a tax equivalent to 10 per cent of the amount paid for the transportation of persons by rail or water, within the United States, not including the amount paid for commutation or season tickets for trips less than 30 miles, or for transportation the fare for which does not exceed 25 cents, and a tax equivalent to 10 per cent of the amount paid for seats, berths, and staterooms in parlor cars, sleeping cars, or on vessels. If a ticket or mileage book used for such transportation or accommodation has been purchased before this section takes effect, the tax imposed by this section shall be collected from the person presenting the ticket or mileage book, by the conductor or other agent, when presented for such transportation or accommodation and the amount so collected shall be paid to the United States in such manner and at such times as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, may prescribe; (d) a tax equivalent to 5 per cent of the amount paid for the transportation of oil by pipe line; (e) a tax equivalent to 5 per cent of the amount paid for electric power for domestic uses and of the amount paid for light or heat, and a tax equivalent to 5 per cent of the amount paid for telephone service by subscribers, exclusive of the amounts paid for toll or long-distance calls: Provided, That any expense incurred by any person, corporation, partnership, or association, in furnishing such power, light, heat, or telephone service, for its own use shall not be subject to this tax; (f) a tax of 5 cents upon each dispatch, message, or conversation, which originates at any office, station, or exchange, within the United States, of any telegraph or telephone line, which is transmitted over such line, and for which a charge of 15 cents or more is imposed: Provided, That only one payment of such tax shall be required, notwithstanding the lines of one or more persons, corporations, partnerships, or associations shall be used for the transmission of such dispatch, message, or conversation.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. KITCHIN. I was about to move to rise.

Mr. MANN. That is the reason I made the motion.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

The resolution is as follows:

House concurrent resolution relating to military highway along the Texas border.

Whereas the experience of the Federal Government in the protection of the southern and southwestern border of the United States, along the Rio Grande River through Texas, and through New Mexico, Arizona, and California, has demonstrated the tremendous importance of a military highway through these States to facilitate the movement of munitions, supplies, and men; and

Whereas Members of the Texas delegation in both Houses of Congress have for many years past urged upon the Congress the great importance of the construction by the Federal Government of such a military highway along the Rio Grande River through Texas: Therefore be it

Resolved by the house of representatives (the senate concurring), That we earnestly commend to the consideration of the Congress the advisability of early provision being made for the construction of such military highway along the southwestern border of the United States, through the States of Texas, New Mexico, Arizona, and California, and that said highway extend northward on the Texas and California coasts at least 150 miles.

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be forwarded by the chief clerk of the house to the Hon. Newton D. Baker, Secretary of War, and to the Senators and Representatives in Congress from Texas.

Adopted May 3, 1917.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The VICE PRESIDENT presented a telegram in the nature of a petition from the Nebraska State Council of Defense, praying for the enactment of legislation for the conservation of food and fuel, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition of the yearly meeting of the Religious Society of Friends, of Philadelphia, Pa., praying for national prohibition as a war measure, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I present a telegram signed by a large number of prominent citizens of my State. I ask that it be printed in the RECORD, together with the names of the signers and their official positions and business connections, in order to show that it is entitled to serious consideration by the Senate.

There being no objection, the telegram was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SALEM, OREG., May 16, 1917.

OREGON DELEGATION,
Care of GEORGE E. CHAMBERLAIN,
Washington, D. C.:

Whereas the prices of the staple necessaries of life have advanced to figures exceeding cost of production to an extent far beyond the limits of conscience and any possible conception of human rights or reason and are still advancing; and

Whereas this condition is proof of the utter lack of humane consideration on the part of those responsible and indicates a frantic desire and effort to levy merciless war assessments in advance upon the public whereby the beneficiaries may later meet their own obligations without sacrifice, if not at actual profit; and

Whereas such business is unpatriotic to the equivalent of treason or insurrection, it proves its perpetrators to be limited only by the heartless principle of taking all the traffic will bear or all an unprotected people can be forced to pay; and

Whereas Congress has undisputed authority over every resource of the Nation in the present crisis, which authority is being exercised in the taking of the bodies of our best young men for military service, and the action is met with ready support in a spirit of glorious sacrifice by the people; but the flagrant abuse by the food speculators, pursued from palpable motives of greedy disregard of the great emergency that is upon us, go unchecked and unchallenged except by ineffective and dilatory discussion: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the undersigned do hereby most earnestly urge upon our National Congress the great need of immediate and effective action to relieve this most menacing situation, which is rapidly contributing to the aid of the enemies of the Nation and already amounts to one of the gravest obstacles to the success of our country in the great crisis that now confronts it.

Senator K. D. MCKELLAR,

We understand effort is being made to reconsider in the Senate the Hardwick amendment to exchange law. Trust you can use your influence against reconsidering. Banks will handle all matters pertaining to Government bonds without any charge whatever.

CHATTANOOGA, TENN., May 18, 1917.

HON. KENNETH D. MCKELLAR,
Washington, D. C.:

Representing 150 manufacturing firms in Chattanooga, I urge your support in eliminating the tax on freight charges in present revenue measure. This will affect most seriously manufacturers who have to bear their full share of other war taxes, and especially when confronted with heavy increase in freight rates. Hope this section will be stricken out, as it is a very serious matter to industry.

JNO. J. MAHONEY,
President Chattanooga Manufacturers' Association.

CHATTANOOGA, TENN., May 15, 1917.

Senator K. D. MCKELLAR,
Washington, D. C.:

The executive council of the Tennessee Bankers' Association now in session at the annual meeting are much gratified at your support of the Hardwick-Kitchin amendment to the Federal reserve act and would greatly appreciate your standing firmly against any effort at reconsideration and urge your active influence to that end with your fellow Senators. We pledge that Tennessee bankers will handle all funds growing out of liberty loans without cost for exchange to the Government.

MEMPHIS, TENN., May 17, 1917.

Senator K. D. MCKELLAR,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. MCKELLAR: That paragraph in the pending revenue bill providing for a tax on coffee is unjust in two respects.

First. That it is in a way retroactive, compelling one to date back to stock on hand May 10. Roasters and jobbers had unfilled contracts with retailers and orders in hand taken before that date, which they are compelled to fill without the addition of the amount of the war tax.

Second. In that it exempts from tax on stock three concerns which are among the largest coffee dealers in America—Jewel Tea Co., C. D. Kenny & Co., and Great Atlantic & Pacific Tea Co. Those companies sell only to consumers, yet they do an enormous volume of business, have heavy stocks on hand always, and at least one of them—the Jewel Tea Co.—does not pay its fair proportion of taxes generally in Memphis and other markets where it is carrying on its business.

To allow those three concerns to escape payment of the tax is a direct discrimination against roasters, jobbers, and retailers; they should not be permitted to own their coffee at one cent less than others. It would be fairer to tax all coffee stocks in all retailers' hands; but that is not necessary, as they can be included by inserting the words "importers, roasters" in the bill.

Yours, very truly,

OLIVER-FINNIE CO.,
By M. H. HUNT, Vice President.

P. S.—We are sending a like letter to Hon. HUBERT F. FISHER.

MURFREESBORO, TENN, May 17, 1917.

Hon. JOHN K. SHIELDS,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: We notice that it is proposed that a higher rate of postage be made to apply on first-class mail, while at the same time it is a fact that this class of mail is being handled by the Government at a profit of over $80,000,000, while second-class matter is handled at a considerable loss. We sincerely hope that you will oppose an advance on first-class mail until second-class matter at least pays the Government the cost of handling. We beg to remain,

Yours, respectfully,

HENRY KING & CO.,
HENRY KING, President.

MEMPHIS, TENN., May 17, 1917.

Hon. KENNETH D. MCKELLAR,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: As a specialist in green coffee, I am naturally deeply interested in the revenue bill now before Congress, and while I am not financially affected by either the amount of the tax or the method of application, I am anxious to know at the very earliest possible moment just what is done or, in your opinion, what is most likely to be done.

We all agree that a tax should be applied, and the article is well able to stand its share, but it does look discriminatory to single out coffee and ten from the entire field of foodstuffs for a retroactive tax. Very good arguments can be made along this line, but I will not attempt either pro or con, as my idea in addressing you is to ask that you wire me at my expense any developments toward the passage of the measure or any changes in the present wording.

Thanking you in advance for your consideration of this request, and with best wishes,

Yours, very truly,

GEO. C. BORNER.

MEMPHIS, TENN., May 17, 1917.

Hon. KENNETH D. MCKELLAR,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: I want to thank you for your letter of May 11, in reply to my telegram of the same date, which referred to the proposed increased tax on tobaccos.

I am not so greatly interested in this matter from a personal standpoint, but I am interested more for the interest of my friends, some of the manufacturers.

I believe that a 100 per cent increased tax on tobaccos, as proposed, is too large a share for the tobacco trade to stand, and that such a tax would decrease the consumption, and thereby decrease the income proportionally. Then, too, the increased tax will be borne by the consumer, which means that he will pay more for the same quantity or get less quantity for the same money. If the consumption is less, this will affect the tobacco grower and those dependent upon him and the employees of tobacco manufacturers.

I believe that the tobacco trade feels that it could stand an increase of probably 40 per cent or 50 per cent without serious results.

I am inclosing a letter from the Tobacco Manufacturers' Association, of which association we are not members, although we have been solicited many times to become members. This letter may give you some information that you would like to have.

Thanking you very much, indeed, for any considerations in my behalf,

I am, yours, truly,

ROBT. L. JORDAN.

NEW YORK, May 14, 1917.

To the TOBACCO TRADE:

The war revenue bill recommended by the Ways and Means Committee adds, as estimated by that committee, about 45 per cent to the taxes on cigars and increases the tax on tobacco from 8 cents to 16 cents per pound, and on cigarettes from $1.25 to $2.50 per thousand.

It is needless to say that such tax would be an unbearable burden upon our industry. It would mean a sharp reduction in the consumption of tobacco products; a serious curtailment of the demand for tobacco leaf, with the consequent depreciation in the value of tobacco crops, and a complete demoralization of the entire industry, from the grower to the man behind the counter, with the probable extermination of a great many of the small concerns, who are financially unable to cope with such situation.

The tobacco industry, although already taxed to the extent of $100,000,000 per annum, which is about twice the amount of the aggregate profits of the entire industry, does not seek to shirk the burdens that all patriotic citizens should assume in the present crisis of our country. We nevertheless feel that our industry should be treated with fairness and moderation, and we must therefore protest against the imposition of exorbitant and unbearable taxes, which would undoubtedly spell disaster to the entire industry.

The Tobacco Merchants' Association has, with the approval of the leading tobacco men in this country, submitted a schedule of new tax rates, whereby the Government would gain an increases of about 42½ per cent over the present revenue. We proposed that the tax on cigarettes be raised from $1.25 to $1.75 per thousand, and on tobacco from 8 cents to 11.2 cents per pound, and a graduated scale of tax on cigars at the rate of 25 cents per thousand on little cigars, commonly known as all-tobacco cigarettes; 50 cents per thousand on the class of goods known as stogies, cheroots, and other cheap cigars, retailing at 4 cents or less; $1 per thousand on cigars retailing from 4 cents to 6 cents; $2 per thousand on cigars retailing at over 6 cents and not above 12½ cents, and a corresponding progressive graduation on higher priced goods.

By adopting our schedule the Government would gain about 42½ per cent increase in revenue, which is all that the industry can possibly stand without suffering serious injury. On the other hand, the increase proposed by the Ways and Means Committee would not only cripple the industry and bring about ruin and disaster to many that are engaged in it, but would cut down the consumption of tobacco products to such an extent that the revenue derived under the increased taxation may not exceed the revenue collected under the existing law, if it shall indeed reach such figure.

The bill is now under advisement by the Senate Committee on Finance, and we are confident indeed that our protest against the House bill will receive the serious and careful consideration that it is entitled to.

To thus save the industry from wreck and ruin we must act at once, and we must have the support and cooperation of the entire industry. We ask you, therefore, as urgently as we know how, to write or wire immediately to the Hon. F. M. SIMMONS, chairman Committee on Finance, United States Senate, Washington, D. C., protesting against the Kitchin bill and indorsing the schedule submitted by this association, and also to the Senators representing your State in the United States Senate (addressed Washington, D. C.) asking them to present your protest to Senator SIMMONS and his committee, and please also advise us of your action in the matter.

Mr. GERRY. I desire to announce that the Senator from California [Mr. PHELAN] and the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST] are necessarily absent on official business.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Sixty-four Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, the amendment by the committee authorizes the expenditure of $750,000,000 for the construction or purchase of vessels. It gives to the President power to have the vessels constructed, to name representatives who shall manage the business of construction, and equips him fully with authority to bring about the acquirement of the vessels that will be obtained by this investment.

The amendment which I have offered authorizes the use of $100,000,000 of the $750,000,000 for the acquirement in the same way of freight cars to handle the business interests of our own country.

The transportation of commodities across the water must depend upon their proper delivery at the ports. The domestic business of our entire country depends upon the prompt movement of commodities.

It is well known that now there is what is called a shortage of freight cars to the amount of 100,000. In other words, there is freight offered for transportation and demanding transportation in excess of the car equipment to an amount which would require 100,000 additional cars.

Every line of industry suffers from it. The farmer is in doubt about moving his crop. The lumberman complains that the work of his mill lies unused for lack of transportation. The coal producer complains, and the man in the city finds that the price of his coal soars, and when he complains he is told it is car shortage in a large part which has produced it.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Right in line with what the Senator is saying, if he will permit me, I want to call attention to a notice that is being sent out by the railroad companies to my section of the country where we produce a great deal of fruit, indicating to the people there that they may not have cars to transport the fruit that they raise and warning them about the condition. I will just read a line or two if the Senator will permit me from this notice, sent out by the Northern Pacific Railroad Co.:

I am directed to advise all shippers, that, on account of war and other conditions, it may be impossible at harvest time to furnish equipment enough to take care of movement of perishable commodities, also it may be that the national committee on transportation at Washington, under whose direction the railways of the country are now operating, may direct the preference movement of commodities needed for food and other purposes, so that apples and other fruits, which may be classed as luxuries, will not move to as great an extent as expected, or warranted by the crop conditions, and that under the circumstances it would be well if growers and shippers of perishable commodities would provide frost-proof storage in order to take care of their crops this fall.

That will produce a very deplorable condition of things. A great many of our people depend wholly upon these crops for their livelihood, and if the railway companies are going to send out notices of this kind now there is no encouragement to people to go on producing the crops; there will be stagnation in that locality; and when similar notices are sent to other localities we are going to have a general depression of business, unless we can provide some way by which transportation facilities can be afforded.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I have had letters within the past few weeks, many of them, from different parts of the United States, from men engaged in different lines of business, complaining, bemoaning the fact that cars can not be obtained for the transportation of commodities which they are entitled to have moved to consumers. So extreme is the situation that now there is pending before the Interstate Commerce Committee a bill sent from the other end of the Avenue which proposes to give the President, or some man or men to be named by the President, the right to designate what shall be moved and what shall not be moved. The Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] advises me that such an order has already been issued.

Mr. BANKHEAD. An order has been issued, I understand, by the chairman of the committee, that coal, iron, and ore are to have preference.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. What committee?

Mr. BANKHEAD. The railroad executive committee, of which Mr. Harrison, the president of the Southern Railway, is the chairman. He seems to have been investigating the matter.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I suppose it is the National Council of Defense or some subsidiary committee acting with unlimited authority under it.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I wish to suggest that in this notice from the railway company it is stated here that "it may be that the national committee on transportation at Washington, under whose direction the railways of the country are now operating, may direct the preference movement of commodities," and thus tend to create a shortage.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Of course, we understand to-day that nobody has any such authority. There is, however, a bill pending, so serious is the situation, which proposes to give the President the right to name some one who shall have the power——

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator for a little explanation of his amendment. I have read it hurriedly, and I interpret it to mean that $100,000,000 of the appropriation for ships shall be diverted for the construction of freight cars, which will be owned by the Government, of course, and the Government will leave them out or rent them out to the various railroads according to their necessities.

Mr. President, there may be merit in that, but this Chamber has resounded with the cry that what is needed is "ships, ships, ships," quoting a distinguished Englishman. If we should divert this $100,000,000 from the shipping fund, of course we should have to vote another $100,000,000 to that organization, I apprehend. Is there to be no limit to the amount of funds that the Government of the United States can expend this year?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I am not prepared to answer that question; but I do insist that as between $750,000,- 000 for ships and $650,000,000 for ships, and $100,000,000 for cars, the distribution which I have suggested is the better one.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I yield.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I should like to ask the Senator from Georgia if the car-building concerns are in a position to build these cars if the order shall be given?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The most unlimited power is given to the President and to whomsoever he may name in connection with the construction of the ships; and I propose by this amendment to extend the same authority to him with reference to cars, as being the only way to secure the cars.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I should like to inquire also of the Senator as to the ability to secure the locomotives with which to move these cars after they shall have been constructed?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, the shortage is primarily with cars and the lack of ability to distribute them. There are roads with locomotives that are retained permanently by their owners, whose cars have been absorbed in other parts of the United States by companies without cars, and who, on account of the absence of their cars, are literally unable to move local freight, although they have the motive power so far as locomotives are concerned. I have a most interesting complaint, which was printed a few days ago in a traffic journal, from one of the leading railroads in the United States, which is making a handsome profit and which has amply provided itself with cars, that its cars are on other lines or on other roads; that it can not get them back and consequently is unable to move the local traffic for the lack of cars.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Senator has not mentioned, I think, the great evil that cars, instead of being used for transportation, are being too largely used for storage on lines where they do not belong.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I think that is one of the abuses.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Should not some action be taken to compel the use of those cars for transportation purposes?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I should be delighted to see that done.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I should like to ask the Senator from Georgia whether it is possible for Congress to provide the charge that railroads shall pay per day for the use of cars?

Mr. THOMAS. If the Senator from Georgia will permit me to answer, I will say that I think that the Interstate Commerce Commission has that power, and that they have exercised it in their effort to break up the practice of so using cars.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Can the Senator from Colorado state what the charge is?

Mr. THOMAS. I can not state what the charge is now, but I was told last winter by the commissioner having this particular subject under his jurisdiction that he had doubled the amount of demurrage, and that he proposed to quadruple it, if necessary, in order to secure cars. He also told me that he had doubled the charge for the use of cars which one road must pay to another. I think it was 25 cents a day; and then he has doubled it in order to compel the return of such cars.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I have been told that the charge is so low that cars are now being used for storage purposes, and in that way they promote speculation.

Mr. THOMAS. The fact is that the effort by that means to prevent congestion caused by using cars for storage purposes has not yet brought much benefit.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. My judgment is that it has not been used to a sufficient extent. If the rate is made high enough, the railroads will have an inducement to build cars; but if the charge is kept too low, they will have no inducement to build cars.

Mr. THOMAS. Unquestionably.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. So long as the charge is kept low the cars will be kept idle for storage purposes on side tracks and speculators will use them for storage purposes.

Mr. THOMAS. I myself should like to see the charge made prohibitive.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, as I understand, the Interstate Commerce Commission now has the power to raise demurrage rates on cars, and they are seeking to remedy the condition growing out of the failure to unload the cars promptly by charging such rates as will compel the cessation of the use of cars for warehouse purposes.

But, Mr. President, that does not meet the question. The real difficulty of the situation grows out of the fact that a portion of our roads are weak and are not providing themselves with the proper number of cars. There is difficulty even in obtaining them where the money is in hand. It is a problem of such national importance that it falls into the same class as transportation across the water; and I submit that we may well use a percentage of this $750,000,000 to relieve local conditions. I fear they can not be relieved, and they will not be relieved, in any other way.

I am aware of the fact that there is now pending before the Interstate Commerce Commission an application for 15 per cent increase of freight rates by the railroads of the United States. There is, however, no guarantee that, if the increase is allowed, it will bring the result desired. On the contrary, if we study the history of the past three years we must reach the conclusion that the increase of net receipts to the railroads as a whole would not meet the trouble which confronts the shippers of the country. I say so, Mr. President, because for the year ending June 30, 1916, the railroads of the country had the most lucrative business in their history. After paying all liabilities of operation and all liabilities upon indebtedness and interest charges, their net remaining profit in hand for distribution to stockholders or for other use, as the officers of the companies might see fit, was $601,000,000; and this, too, on a capitalization of $6,963,000,000—over 8½ per cent as an average on all the stock of the railroads of the United States. I have a memorandum showing their bonded debt, their capital stock, their investment account, and the calculation by which the result I have just mentioned was reached. I do not desire to detain the Senate to read it, but I ask the privilege of printing it in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The memorandum referred to is as follows:

Class 1 roads reported to the commission are roads earning gross revenues annually of $1,000,000 or more. They constitute 89 per cent of the mileage and 97 per cent of the revenue of all the railroads in the United States.

These roads show the following financial status July 1, 1916:

Bonds and debts	$9,958,599,183
Capital stocks, preferred, common, and debentures	6,963,911,646
Aggregating total	16,922,510,839

The property investment account of all these roads for the same period is $17,984,243,886.

Thus it appears that their property investment account is a little in excess of $1,000,000,000 of their bonded indebtedness, capital stock, etc., according to their books.

Their net corporate income for the year ending June 30, 1916, was $1,272,052,814.

Out of that they paid interest on their funded debts, consisting of bonds, etc., amounting to $898,174,653.

After paying all expenses, including interest on their bonded debts and other debts, they had a net income of $601,508,398.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I have also, Mr. President, a statement of the revenues of the railroads of the United States from 1888 to July 30, 1916. It covers railroads earning a million dollars or more annually, which report to the Interstate Commerce Commission, and shows the tremendous growth of business, the immensely increased tax upon transportation facilities, and also the gratifying increase of net profits which the companies have made. I ask that this table may also be printed in the RECORD without reading.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I also call attention to the table prepared by Mr. Clifford Thorne, which I ask to have inserted in my remarks.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I also, Mr. President, have a statement by Mr. Max Thelen, made before the joint committee of both Houses recently, in which he shows for a series of years the increase of business of railroad companies named and their net profits. I wish also to have this statement printed in the RECORD without reading.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The statement referred to is as follows:

STATEMENT OF MR. MAX THELEN.

Mr. THELEN. Referring just for a moment to the table which was inserted in the record of Wednesday's proceedings, showing the moneys available for dividends both in 1915 and 1916 on certain of the leading railroads, as selected by the New York Times, I have here now a copy of the Annalist, which is a magazine of finance, commerce, and, 4, 1916. In that copy there appears under the heading "An exhibit in railroad prosperity" the details of the table which I presented on Wednesday, showing the exact amount in dollars of gross operating revenues, operating income, and balance available for dividends on the common stock as to each of the railroads which are shown in the earlier table. The table is rather short, and if I may be permitted, I should like to submit that table as supplementing the other and giving the details.

Mr. SIMS. Is this statement to go in with what you are reading now?

Mr. THELEN. No; I do not care for the statement; I just want the table.

The table referred to is here printed in full, as follows:

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Now, Mr. President, this brings us down to the condition of the railroads on July 1, 1916. In spite of the increased cost of operation their increased profits carried their total net profits for that year to a higher figure than ever before in their history.

I have here the report of the Interstate Commerce Commission giving the business for these same railroads for the last six months of 1916. Again, it is true that the operating expenses increased; again they were confronted with the high prices about which complaint is made with reference to their operating expenses; but it is gratifying to note that, in spite of the increase in the cost of the things needed for operation, their net profits increased in the last six months of 1916 $57,000,000 over their net profits for the last six months of 1915. I have, Mr. President, the detailed report of the Interstate Commerce Commission covering the last six months of 1916, which I desire to insert in the RECORD without reading.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered. The matter referred to is as follows:

Summary of monthly reports of large roads for the 6 months ended with December.

[Compilations, subject to revision, from reports of revenues and expenses of steam roads in the United States for the 6 months ended with December, 1916. (Cents omitted.) This summary covers only roads having operating revenues above $1,000,000 for the year ended June 30, 1916.]

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Now, we come down to the first three months of 1917. The western roads increased their profits for the first three months of 1917 over their net profits for the first three months of 1916, and the southern roads increased their net profits for those three months over their net profits for 1916. The eastern roads showed an immense increase in the expenses of operation and a loss of net profits.

I call attention to these facts to show that the difficulty—if there is a difficulty—is not to be obviated by a flat increase of 15 per cent in freight rates. As to many of the roads, their net profits are now much above 10 per cent, and as to some of them the net profits are very small. The old roads, well-established and with splendid connections, get the business and the new road invading the territory of the old roads does not get it; and when the rates or charges are increased 15 per cent the bulk of that increase will be absorbed by the old-established roads, and the 10 per cent and over of net profit, which many of them are now earning, will run far beyond that amount, while the other roads may still barely be able to live.

The 15 per cent flat increase can not possibly stand the test of reasonableness and justice, first, because it will increase the profits of so many roads whose profits are already very large, but far and beyond that, because the test of the reasonableness and justice of a rate depends upon two things—a fair compensation to the railroad company and a fair charge to the shipper to permit his products to move. There are commodities the rates on which might perhaps be increased 15 per cent, which could yet stand a still further increase, while there are many commodities that can not move with an increased charge. It can not be determined that a rate is reasonable and just without applying it to the particular commodity. To find a rate reasonable and just it is necessary to classify it by commodities and by localities. Therefore, I urge that a flat 15 per cent increase is necessarily one that can not be reasonable and just. When the time comes to study this proposed increase and to study it with reference to the particular commodities and localities it may be allowed as to some, but as to many it can not be allowed, and to grant the increase without an investigation of commodities and localities in detail, to permit it without that study, is necessarily to put upon the public rates unreasonable and unjust.

But what I especially desire to do—and I have been rather diverted from the thread of my argument by discussing the proposed 15 per cent flat increase—is to urge that we do not reach the difficulty about the shortage of cars through increasing the gross receipts of the railroad companies. If the net profit from railroading had been generally apportioned during the past two years they could easily have diverted $200,000,000 for cars. The difficulty has been that those that had the money, as a rule, did not need the cars, and those that needed the cars did not have the money, and they still would be without them with the 15 per cent increase.

Now, the people need the cars; the public need the equipment; the public are entitled to the benefit that would come from the presence of ample cars to haul during the next two years the commodities they have which they are ready to ship to the places of market.

What is the plan I propose? I propose to give the President, through the same agency or some other agency that he may prefer to use to construct or acquire ships, the same power and in the same way to construct or acquire cars to the extent of $100,000,000; not to throw the money away, but with the further authority to let them out by contract to the railroads, with compensation for their use, and preferably, as the amendment provides, by sale to the railroad companies.

I do not contemplate a dollar of loss to the National Government or to the people. There would be no loss. The one hundred millions would be a temporary investment, to be returned, with the interest easily carried until the return of the principal came. It would be an investment without a risk; and that the great war need of the people of the country may be met, that business may continue to move, that the various industries from the farm to the shop may have an opportunity to continue as nearly normal as possible, that is the object of the amendment.

I know the proposition is novel; but are we now to be frightened by the suggestion that something proposed is novel? I know it has originated in the Senate, and I have offered it here as a Senator. That is novel.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KING in the chair). Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I should like to ask the Senator if he would be willing to carry the principle a little further, and have the Federal Government advance money for the building of railroads in sections of the country where railroads are needed and where they have not now adequate means of transportation?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. No; I would not. I voted against the Alaskan railroad proposition. I thought it highly improper. That is an utterly different thing from the suggestion that the people of the whole country, not simply a locality, are to be served. To build a railroad in a single locality is to tax all the people for a local purpose. I would not touch it if it were local in its nature; but this question has risen to one of nation-wide importance. It touches the people everywhere, from the Pacific to the Atlantic, from the Lakes to the Gulf. It is the universality of the demand that justifies it.

I said a few moments ago that it was novel that such an ambitious proposition should originate in legislative halls without coming to us from somewhere else; but it is not nearly so startling as the $750,000,000 for ships.

I do not desire to detain the Senate. With most intense conviction of the value of this legislation I present it. I wish I could induce Senators really to consider it. Three weeks ago I would not have voted for it myself. It would have startled me if somebody else had suggested it. But I have been giving a great deal of my leisure to the railroad question since the proposition was made, and came fully to me, that the railroad companies were to put a permanent tax of from three to four hundred millions a year upon the people of the country by increasing flatly their freight rates. I have been impressed with the fact that something was needed, but I did not think that was the thing that was needed. I finally reached the conclusion that more freight cars would come nearer relieving the present situation than anything else, and having reached that conclusion I determined to present it to the Senate, and I was looking for a place. When I saw this little appropriation of $750,000,000 for ships, with all the fully developed powers needed for their prompt construction, I thought I had found the place where, from just a Member of the Senate upon the floor, the amendment could come and be subject to no point of order that could prevent its consideration, and if attached to the bill it would receive speedy action everywhere.

I have given the view I entertain upon the subject, and I will not detain the Senate longer.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, before the Senator takes his seat, will he permit me to ask him a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I just want to ask whether the Senator would have any objection to inserting, after the words "freight cars," the words "refrigerator cars"?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Not at all.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I will ask that that be done.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there is no objection, the amendment will be modified accordingly.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do.

Mr. WALSH. Before the Senator takes his seat, I wish to ask him a question. I endeavored to follow the line of reasoning of the Senator from Georgia, and I gathered that in his view the railroads have been enjoying a season of unusual and unexampled prosperity in the last two years.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It is entirely true until the last few months, when the roads in the East seemed to have their expense accounts running much higher and their net profits substantially decreased.

Mr. WALSH. Then it would seem to me that they are in better shape than they ever were before to provide themselves with cars, without calling upon the Government to aid to the extent of $100,000,000 in providing them with equipment. Is not that true?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. But they have not done it, and I am not sure they could get the cars now through their own action. I doubt whether they could find an opportunity to have the cars manufactured promptly, except through the powers given to the Government with reference to ships. It is a mere authority. This amendment does not compel the action.

I present two additional tables, giving in different shape the figures I have used.

The tables referred to are as follows:

RAILWAY REVENUES.

A summary of the results of operations in March was made public by the commission May 3. It covers 96 roads, with a mileage of 113,187.

For the country as a whole the operating revenue increased from $148,439,924 to $165,694,613; expenses from $99,498,330 to $118,179,692, or from $434 to $419 per mile of road operated.

In the eastern district the revenue rose from $62,189,954 to $69,367,858; expenses from $43,917,782 to $53,543,164; and net declined from $18,269,172 to $15,824,694, or from $653 to $563 per mile.

In the southern district the revenue rose from $32,926,191 to $36,531,738; expenses from $21,124,027 to $23,997,124; and net from $11,752,164 to $12,534,612, or from $377 to $401 per mile.

An equally satisfactory condition was shown in the western district, the revenue rising from $53,326,779 to $59,759,017; expenses from $34,406,521 to $40,639,404; and net from $18,920,258 to $19,155,613, or from $351 to $356 per mile.

For the three months of the fiscal year which began January 1 the operating revenue for the country as a whole advanced from $415,193,795 to $460,052,895; expenses from $287,666,222 to $335,319,658, causing a decline in the net from $127,527,673 to $124,733,237, or from $1,130 to $1,101 per mile.

In the eastern district the revenue advanced from $176,759,532 to $188,265,377; expenses from $127,137,771 to $161,289,024, causing a decline in the net from $49,621,761 to $36,976,353, or from $1,773 to $1,315 per mile.

In the southern district the revenue rose from $93,397,341 to $103,574,601; expenses from $61,370,394 to $68,901,264; and the net from $32,026,247 to $34,673,377, or from $1,030 to $1,110 per mile.

In the western district the revenue rose from $145,036,922 to $168,212,917; expenses from $99,158,057 to $116,129,370; and the net from $45,878,865 to $53,083,547, or from $853 to $895 per mile.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, the subject matter of the amendment of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] is now under consideration by the Interstate Commerce Committee of the Senate. It is undoubtedly true that for many months there has been a car shortage which has interrupted transportation in many localities and worked great hardship upon shippers. It is also true that some of them have advocated the construction or purchase by the Government of freight cars and the renting of those cars to the railroads in order to attempt to relieve the congested condition of traffic.

Mr. President, the principle underlying the amendment of the Senator from Georgia is one of very far-reaching importance. It involves in some respects the question of Government ownership of railroads. The Senator from Georgia himself has presented to the Senate the fact that the railroads during the last fiscal year have been more prosperous than at any other period during the history of transportation in the United States. If the Government is to embark upon a policy of furnishing equipment for railroads, it means that the railroads will use only their own cars, save when there is a congested condition of traffic, and then they will use the cars furnished by the Government. It means that the Government will supply the deficiencies which the railroads themselves have failed to provide.

The Senator from Georgia is familiar with the fact that there is going on in railroad circles an agitation intended to bring about an enormous increase in railroad freight rates at the present time, on the theory that the railroads are unable to provide the necessary equipment to move the freight of the country, and that if this increase in rates is allowed they may provide the necessary equipment to move the freight.

I think this subject is too important; I think it involves too much to attach it as an amendment to the bill now under consideration. I agree with the Senator from Georgia that legislation on this subject should be considered. Mr. President, I have been amazed at the rapidity with which the United States has approached the Government ownership of its transportation facilities. Twenty years ago Democrats and Republicans alike characterized Government ownership of railroads as populistic and socialistic; but now there is upon the part of many railroad men in the United States a movement to compel the Government to purchase the railroads of the country. It is a significant fact that the railroads have failed to provide under private ownership adequate transportation facilities. While they have reaped during the last year greater profits than at any other period in the history of the United States, they have almost totally failed to provide the additional facilities required to move the increased commerce of the country. The amendment of the Senator from Georgia contemplates that the Government of the United States shall spend a hundred million dollars—and that will be an inadequate sum——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President——

Mr. ROBINSON. Just a moment. The estimate upon the part of some railroad men is that it will require $2,500,000,000 to supply the additional equipment necessary to meet the transportation requirements of the United States.
